Knesset committee comes down hard on world Maccabi

CJN News Services

A Knesset committee has recommended the State of Israel not finance the 16th Maccabiah Games to be held next summer, and that no official Israeli representative attend public events held by the Maccabi World Union (MWU) unless MWU president Ronald Bakalarz resigns.

The committee was set up to examine the aftermath of the 1997 Maccabiah Games bridge disaster in which four members of the Australian delegation were killed and dozens injured.

The report was presented recently to Knesset speaker Avraham Burg. It states that "under the leadership of Bakalarz, the MWU made some terrible mistakes that only served to deepen the divide between the Jewish communities... The committee calls on the government to continue to operate so as to close the issue of compensation for those injured in the Maccabiah disaster as soon as possible."

"This incident clouds the relations between Israel and the Jewish community of Australia and everything must be done to put it behind us," the report stated.

The report was greeted with jubilation by members of the Australian Jewish community. Ron Weiser, president of the Australian Zionist Federation, said he felt "ecstatic" about the findings.

Colin Elterman, father of Sasha Elterman, who was seriously injured in the bridge collapse four years ago, said he was "delighted" by the report, which he believes "vindicates us and our supporters" following three years of bitter complaints about "the insensitive conduct of MWU and the need for the state to pay all compensation to the victims and their families."

He added the proviso that the report "will mean nothing, unless it is implemented."

There was no rejoicing at the MWU headquarters in Kfar Hamaccabiah, Ramat Gan. Australian hopes for the resignation by Bakalarz have not been realized.

Amir Peled, honorary secretary of MWU, said he "objected strongly" to the "formula" outlined in the report: "Bakalarz out; Australia Maccabi in [at the next Maccabi games]" and with "the stipulation that unless Bakalarz resigns, the government will boycott 56 delegations coming to Israel for the Jewish games." He emphasized that Bakalarz was not convicted of any offence.

MWU chair Uzi Netanel resigned his position in April, several hours after five defendants, including Yoram Eyal, MWU's chair of the Games organizing committee, were found guilty of negligently causing the deaths of the four members of Australia's delegation.

Peled did admit that "not everything went smoothly" in dealing with the aftermath of the bridge collapse and that MWU was not "totally sensitive" to the victims, "something [MWU] is very sorry about."

Isi Leibler, chair of the governing board of the World Jewish Congress and a former head of the Australian Jewish community, said he was "delighted" with the recommendations outlined in the report, but "we'll be watching with interest to see if they are implemented."

Leibler called on Bakalarz to "do the right thing for the organization."

"The leadership of MWU will be meeting within a few weeks and we'll be making some decisions," said Roy Salomon, co-chair of the North American Confederation of MWU.

Salomon, who also serves as president of Maccabi Canada, declined further comment.

In other developments, Australian Jewry has threatened to boycott the Israeli delegation at the Sydney Olympiad.

"No Australian [Jewish] official should meet the Israeli Olympic team – otherwise, the result could be the painful spectre of Jews in Australia demonstrating against the Israeli team," said Colin Rubenstein, executive director of the Australia Israel and Jewish Affairs Council, at Knesset committee hearings in Melbourne.

Rubenstein's sister was one of 60 Australian Jewish athletes injured in the bridge collapse.

His statement came two days after the Australian Maccabiah organization suspended its involvement in next year's Maccabiah Games.

Meanwhile, 63 people have lodged claims with Israel's courts for compensation, with more expected to make private claims. Isi Leibler called on all Jewish organizations to boycott MWU while his brother, Australia United Israel Appeal chair Mark Leibler said he would ask the Jewish Agency to suspend any connections with MWU.

Meanwhile, the threat of Israel withholding public subsidies for the 16th Maccabiah could blow a hole of 10 to 15 percent in the next Maccabiah budget, forcing MWU to make drastic savings or pass on the shortfall to participating athletes. The Israeli government has postponed making an allocation from the Ministry of Sport's budget for next summer's Maccabiah.

Baseball tryouts on tap for juniors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The boys of summer will be taking their act to Israel next summer, as baseball makes its debut at the Maccabiah Games.

Canada will be sending a junior boys team to the first-ever hardball competition, said Mark Bendahan, the team's coach.

Bendahan, who has pitched for Canada's softball team at several Maccabiahs, announced that tryouts for the Canadian team will be held in Toronto on July 30 at Richmond Green, near Leslie and Elgin Mills, beginning at 9 a.m.

Only boys born in 1985, '86 or '87 are eligible for the team.

Regional tryouts have already been held in Montreal and Bendahan expects to scout more talent in western Canada later this summer. National tryouts to determine the final roster will be held in Toronto some time in August.

Bendahan said baseball made its Maccabi debut at the Pan American Maccabi Games in Mexico City last year, with the Canadian juniors winning a silver medal.

For more information, call Mark Bendahan at 905-884-8664.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

As a teenager during the war, I lived with my family in a suburb of Warsaw. It was filled with Luftwaffe officers who were being billeted in the neighbouring Polish houses.

Our villa stood in a pretty garden, full of flowers and surrounded by a fence. In front of the house, there were fields and gardens in which we, and others, planted potatoes and various kinds of vegetables to survive.

All around us was raging one of the cruelest wars in history.

For several months, the bell used to ring at our front door. Infrequently at first and then more often. Looking out the window we did not see anybody at the gate. But some invisible hands had put on the low fence wall two empty cans, with a length of string fastened to them serving as handles.

They were placed there by starving Jews in the hopes they would be filled with food.

Whatever extra food we had we shared with a Jewish woman whom we concealed in our home for 2½ years. Yet, my mother poured some soup into one of the cans and she filled the other with rich bread and potatoes, even though bread was rationed and we were very, very short of it all the time during the war.

Replacing the tins on the same place on the fence, I first had to look carefully around to make sure no German was watching.

However, we knew very well that from the nearby potato field, two anxious pairs of eyes were watching my every movement. Those eyes – serious, alert, frightened yet courageous – belonged to children no more than six and eight years old.

Every day, they left the bleak streets of the ghetto, and then, stealing through some breach in the wall which separated them from the world of the living, they crept along the seemingly peaceful district of our neighbourhood.

Dressed in rags and oversized coats – much too big for their size and age – with large pockets, they were barefoot so they could move noiselessly. Crouching almost to the ground, they leaped out of the thicket and, in a flash, snatched the tins and vanished.

Discreetly observing them through the curtains, I noticed they did not eat what they received; it was meant for others more hungry than them.

They were very careful as they realized that their presence could bring danger and disaster to our whole family. They did not, or could not, think of what lay in store for them.

This lasted a few months – not every day – but every few days, the boys would come. We had almost become friends, even though we hadn't exchanged a word.

One day they stopped coming…

Some time later, the wind from Warsaw brought to our garden pieces of partly burnt paper and smoke with strange, at that time unknown to me, letters and signs. Those were Jewish letters, Jewish characters.

The Warsaw Ghetto was on fire. I never saw my two Jewish friends again.

All this took place during the festive days of Osterfest, Passover, Easter of 1943 – holidays that should have brought joy and peace to people of all nations…

Zbigniew Mankowski then raised a medal and holding it near his heart, told the students: "Years later, I received this medal from Yad Vashem, the most beautiful medal one can imagine. You see, most people receive medals for taking lives, but this medal was given for saving lives.

"I have received many awards in my life, but this one is the most precious to me.

"When, after nearly 50 years, I had the honour of receiving the distinction of Righteous Among the Nations, I shared in my mind a part of that honour with those anonymous Jewish boys, heroes of those years who will forever remain engraved in my memory.

"They tried to save people too."

Based on a letter written by Zbigniew Mankowski and an address he gave to Canadian Jewish students visiting Poland in 1999. A version of this story was read by Wojtek Ziemilski during the 2000 March of the Living ceremony in Birkenau.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am a 33-year-old single woman, average in height, weight, intelligence and appearance. Needless to say, I have no men beating down my door.

There are certain times of the year that being single makes me feel inferior and very alone. This time of year is tough. Wherever I go I see couples and families. Everyone seems to have that special someone to be with, to lean on, to talk to.

I have made a pact with myself that I will go on no more blind dates. I have been on my share of them over the years and they are always disastrous.

My friend Joanie knows a friend who has a friend that just moved to Toronto. He is supposed to be a very nice guy with a good career and all the rest of that stuff.

From what I understand, he is somewhat observant. He is shomer Shabbat and keeps kosher. I do neither of those things. Do you think I should even bother wasting my time and his? I will probably end up more depressed after the date. Any comments?

Dating Doldrums

Dear Dating Doldrums,

First of all, 33 does not mean you have one foot in a nursing home. You seem to be focused on the negative. Cheer up! Pick yourself up and dust yourself off.

You are too young to be making pacts about dating. Don't assume the worst before you know anything about this fellow's mind, soul and life. He may be a wonderful man with a heart of gold. He may be the guy that you can be with, lean on and talk to. Why would you discount all that? Certainly not because he is shomer Shabbat and keeps kosher.

If he was everything in a guy you were hoping for, would the fact that he is somewhat observant stand in the way of trying to make a relationship work with him? I don't think so.

Take a chance. Put on a smile, have a PMA (positive mental attitude) and go out with him.

Life is full of surprises. This might just be one of them.

Barak willing to defer issue of Jerusalem

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — If negotiations with the Palestinians are resumed, Prime Minister Ehud Barak would consider postponing discussion of the Jerusalem issue along the lines of proposals broached by U.S. President Bill Clinton during the recent Camp David summit.

Ministers briefed by Barak last weekend about the Camp David summit said the prime minister showed willingness to consider a deferral of negotiations.

At the weekly cabinet meeting, Barak reported that after Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat rejected American proposals to resolve the Jerusalem issue, Clinton brought up the possibility of postponing negotiations about the disputed city.

Specifically, Clinton raised two options: First, discussions concerning the status of the Old City and the Temple Mount would be deferred for 15 to 20 years; and secondly, discussion of Jerusalem's outlying areas would be postponed for several years. In the meantime, Israel would refrain from officially annexing to Jerusalem peripheral Jewish neighbourhoods built after 1967, such as Neve Yaakov and Ma'aleh Adumim; these satellite neighbourhoods would belong to an area whose status would be negotiated several years down the line, in talks between Israel and the Palestinian state.

14-year-old wins Rockower award

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Michael Nisimov, a summer student at The Canadian Jewish News, has won an honourable mention in the Noah Bee Award for excellence in cartooning or illustrating, part of the 1999 Simon Rockower Memorial Awards in Jewish Journalism, for drawings he created while he worked at the paper last summer.

It is the fifth year in a row that The CJN has won a Rockower Award.

A graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools, Nisimov, 14, was born in the former Soviet Union and lived in Israel until he was 11 years old.

He credits his mother Nataly, a kindergarten teacher and also an artist, for encouraging his artwork and motivating him to keep drawing.

"She gave me a sheet of paper and pen when I was five years old and she noticed that I drew an actual picture – not the [childish] drawing of a typical five year old," he says.

The News in Brief

Canada

Friends Cheer Romalis

VANCOUVER — Dr. Garson Romalis, who was stabbed July 11, presumably by an anti-abortion fanatic, is in good spirits and expected to be make a full recovery, his friends and family say. Romalis, president of Beth Israel Congregation, made headlines six years ago when he was shot by a sniper in his Vancouver home. Of the five abortion providers who have been attacked in recent years, three have been Jewish.

Emergency Stop

GANDER, Nfld. — An El Al Boeing 747 with 339 passengers aboard was forced to make an emergency landing here last week after a gas leak was discovered in one of the engines. Crews were unable to fix the problem, and passengers spent the night in Gander, waiting for another plane to continue their trip from Tel Aviv to New York.

Vini-der-Pu

MONTREAL — Christopher Robin, Eeyore, Piglet and the other inhabitants of the Hundred-Acre Wood are now available in Yiddish. A Yiddish version of A.A. Milne's children's classic Winnie-the-Pooh, titled Vini-der-Pu, is the work of Yiddish scholar Leonard Wolf of Montreal.

Israel

Child Allowances

JERUSALEM — Israel's Knesset is scheduled to vote on a bill that would greatly increase child allowances paid by the state to families with more than four children, a measure that will primarily benefit haredi families. The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported that at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital, some 40 women who are giving birth each year already have at least 15 children.

Second Cup Closes

TEL AVIV — The Second Cup outlet here has filed for bankruptcy and closed its doors. The shop, just off Ben Yehuda Street, was a regular meeting place mainly for North American students. It was opened by the Canadian chain amid much fanfare a few years ago, but faced stiff competition from nearby cafes frequented by Israelis.

World

Citizenship Revoked

PHILADELPHIA — A federal court judge here has revoked the U.S. citizenship of retired machinist Theodor Szehinskyj, 76, of Drexel Hill, Penn., for his war-era activity. The court ruled that Szehinskyj's service in the SS Death Head Battalions as an armed guard of civilians at Gross-Rosen and Sachsenhausen concentration camps, constituted assistance in persecution as well as "participation in the Third Reich's closed culture of murder."

Giving Up on Web

BERLIN — Germany has given up trying to bar its citizens from accessing foreign-based neo-Nazi sites on the Internet. Germany, which has some of the world's toughest laws banning hate speech, has decided that it is unrealistic to try to shield Germans from foreign Web sites. "You can't build a wall around Germany," one official said.

Woman Elected

LONDON — The umbrella organization that represents most British Jews elected its first woman president in its 240-year history. Jo Wagerman, a former senior vice-president of the Board of Deputies, ran unopposed for a three-year term.

Get Bill Quashed

LONDON — A bill designed to help women whose husbands will not grant them a get (Jewish divorce) was quashed in Britain's House of Commons. The bill would have enabled British courts to help women obtain a religious divorce before granting the final stage of a civil divorce.

Church's Confession

BERLIN — Germany's Roman Catholic Church has admitted there is evidence it may have used forced labourers during World War II. As a result, the church may contribute to a $7.1 billion fund created in Germany to compensate Nazi-era slaves and forced labourers.

Aussies Deport Five

SYDNEY — Australia has deported five people linked to Mideast terrorist groups in advance of September's Olympic Games in Sydney. Word of the deportations came after the government denied reports that agreements have been made with the United States and Israel to allow private security guards to carry guns to protect athletes at the Games.

Shoah Flap

LONDON — The director of the documentary Shoah pulled out of a Holocaust conference because a controversial American academic was also invited to speak. Filmmaker Claude Lanzmann objected to the presence of Norman Finkelstein, author of The Holocaust Industry, which charges that Jewish groups have blackmailed European nations to pay the victims of the Nazis. Conference organizers claimed Finkelstein had been invited without their knowledge.

Leaders React to Failed Talks

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish organizations reacted last week to the collapse of the Camp David peace summit.

Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, observed that his organization understands "that differences remain that could not be bridged at this time. Nevertheless, we are encouraged by the efforts made by the two sides." Wilder also praised the efforts of Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat to pursue an agreement by the September deadline.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen urged calm in the wake of the failed talks. In a statement, Ronen said there is "an obvious unwillingness on the part of the Palestinians to compromise on the most crucial and thorny issues at this point." CJC too said it was heartened that renewed attempts to reach an agreement will be made before the Palestinians' self-imposed deadline of Sept. 13.

B'nai Brith Canada reacted "with grave concern" to the collapsed talks. BBC president Lawrence Hart called on Barak to convene a "World Solidarity Conference" of Jewish leaders to offer support for Israel and to "reaffirm our consensus on the question of Jerusalem."

Young people sought for race relations program

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What is sometimes forgotten in the often tense relationship between the Black and Jewish communities, is the common history of oppression, enslavement and attempts at dehumanization.

Richard Gosling, executive director of North York Committee on Community, Race & Ethnic Relations, has come up with a way to "educate youth between the ages of 15 to 24 about the lasting effects of racial hatred," according to a media release.

The idea, Gosling told The CJN, is to have bright, socially conscious young people – 20 from the Black community and 20 from the Jewish community – learn about each other's history.

They would then go out in the community to help sensitize people to the dangers of racial hatred. In particular, said Gosling, they would help youngsters from, for instance, Rwanda, Somalia, Vietnam, the Sudan and Ethiopia, deal with the lasting effects of racism.

This project, the committee hopes, will "help build bridges between different groups by encouraging the gradual development of understanding and respect for one another, to encourage young people to realize their responsibility for eradicating racial hatred in their communities, and to motivate them to make a positive move towards change."

In early fall, the participants will take part in programs at a Windsor centre commemorating the Underground Railroad – which smuggled slaves into Canada – and the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, UJA FEDERATION, in Toronto.

They will learn about the historical significance of the Underground Railroad and the events leading up to its construction. They will also learn about Rosa Parks, the woman who faced taunts, threats and physical harm when she sat at the front of the bus in pre-integration Alabama.

The group will then go to Windsor, where they will take a simulated journey of the Underground Railroad. They will see the wagons with false

Accountable for our decisions

From the editor's desk

Accountability – the notion that individuals who vie for the authority to make decisions affecting the lives of the people over whom they wield authority must be responsible for the consequences of their decisions – infuses every level of western, democratic life.

It is democracy's most valued test of personal integrity.

First and foremost, it applies in the public sector. It applies in the volunteer sector too, and even in the private sector – although with certain modifications.

The concept rests essentially on two pillars: that we be able to change our decision-makers seamlessly, without disruption in the decision-making process, and certainly without violence or upheaval; and second, that our decision-makers are always acting in the larger, communal interest and not in the narrower, self-interest.

This is the basic theory of accountability. Of course there are myriad variations on the theory according to the institutions, the histories, the cultures and the loyalties involved. Moreover, one person's call to account is another's vendetta. And one person's forbearance is another's accusation.

Nevertheless, it was against the backdrop of our esteemed theory of accountability, that I mused over two items that appeared in last weekend's news.

The headline on the first item was "Ontario water-system crisis looms." The item dealt with a report released by the Ontario Ministry of the Environment that found more than half of 241 municipal water treatment facilities examined by the ministry in the wake of the Walkerton e-coli tragedy, did not meet provincial safety standards! Fully 131 of the 241 systems inspected failed inspection. Another 389 municipal treatment systems remain to be inspected. Who knows what the results of those inspections will be, but there is no reason to think that they will yield a safety rate higher than the shocking 46 percent evidenced in the first 241 systems examined.

The release of the ministry's report followed by one day the uncharacteristically harsh words of the environmental commissioner, Gord Miller, on the government's failure to attach any urgency or priority to environmental protection. "Is the ministry unwilling, incapable or incompetent to perform the task? Or has the ministry management abdicated its responsibility," Miller pointedly asked.

Miller asked the question of the government. But it was directed at all Ontarians.

Ideological differences among us aside, do we not all agree that the provision of safe, healthy drinking water is one of the minimum expectations we can reasonably demand of our provincial government?

Our society is one of the most technologically advanced in the world; it is one of the most affluent in the world. How is it possible then, in this day and age when space shuttles leave the earth's atmosphere and return as a matter of routine, when information travels in a matter of seconds from one computer terminal to another thousands of miles away, that so many Ontarians live with the imminent possibility of being unable to drink from their local community's water supply?

The headline on the second news item was "Canadian Alliance could court Bloc Québécois." The sub-headline expanded upon the main one: "Day won't rule out post-election coalition with separatist party to boost conservatism."

Boosting conservatism is surely a valid political objective. But is it a higher objective than the preservation of the country itself?

The question is not simply rhetorical; nor is it unreasonable to ask it in the circumstance.

The Bloc Québécois, along with the Parti Québécois, is committed to the secession of Quebec from Canada. Both have countless times, unambiguously and publicly, rejected the renewal of the federation in favour of the dismantling of the federation.

Assuming the Canadian Alliance's objective is to one day govern Canada, surely such a laudable objective is antithetical to that of the Bloc Québécois, which is to one day diminish Canada.

If the two parties' strategic aims are incompatible, as they appear to be, any common tactical arrangement must also be incompatible.

Can the two parties' common cause of toppling the Liberals be a sufficient platform on which to build voter trust?

Surely voter trust must be earned on the basis of positive aims, on the basis of defined, and even possibly, lofty and idealistic visions for a country. But for Canadians, can there be anything positive in the Bloc Québécois's expressly avowed aim of destroying Canada?

A decentralized Canada, which is a chief plank in the Canadian Alliance platform is not synonymous with a dismembered Canada.

A pact of expedience with the Bloc Québécois therefore seems hardly an appropriate way of winning support among Canadians for the right to improve the Canadian federation.

Campaign 2001 to focus on children's initiatives

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

BARRIE, Ont. — By focusing on children, adults focus on the future instead of living in the past, Rabbi Yehiel Pupko told a gathering of UJA FEDERATION's Campaign 2001 leadership.

The Judaic resource consultant to Chicago's Jewish federation, Rabbi Pupko – who is also the grandfather of a one-year-old – tied his talk to this year's campaign theme: The Campaign For Our Children.

"Our children are the people who keep us functional," he said.

The day-long leadership retreat, attended by 100 people at the cottage of Allan and Hinda Silber, also included talks by Clive Lessem, New York-based Senior Jewish Agency Representative to United Jewish Communities, and by local representatives of agencies that receive campaign funds.

The campaign goal this year is $45 million, representing a $4 million increase over last year. The extra funds will be devoted strictly to children's initiatives, said Ed Sonshine, who is co-chairing the campaign with Ron Frisch.

Campaign will kick off officially with a community launch at the Royal York Hotel on Aug. 30, featuring Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's minister for Israeli Society and the World Jewish Community; and the Sheba Choir, a troupe of Ethiopian Israeli children.

Perhaps the most poignant presentation of the retreat was that of Jewish Family and Child Service social workers Janice Shaw and Debbie Feldman, about JF&CS' program for children exposed to abuse, as well as services for families living under the poverty line.

When provincial welfare changed two years ago, it put an extra load on JF&CS, said Perry Romberg, senior planner, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, said that although the Jewish community has much to be proud of, it's been "falling behind" because of limitations on day school subsidies.

"This campaign includes a serious increase to the cap," he said. The goal is an increase of $1 million over the $7 million currently allocated, he told The CJN.

More funds are also required to meet the needs of special education students, he noted.

Epstein also addressed the connection between local and overseas aspects of the campaign, when he told of a new local supplementary school teacher who is an alumna of a campaign-funded Joint Distribution Committee summer camp in Hungary.

"The campaign is all one," Epstein said. "An investment we made years ago ended up bringing us a Hebrew teacher from the Carpathian Mountains."

There are 18,000 youth in summer and winter camps across the former Soviet Union, said Lessem. Funding isn't available to accommodate everyone who applies, he noted. "For an extra $250 (US) a year, we can take an extra kid to camp."

Enhancing Jewish identity for local youth is a function of the March of the Living, the annual trip to Poland and Israel for 11th and 12th-graders, as well as Birthright, the free 10-day trip to Israel for 18-to-26-year-olds, noted Susan Jackson, UJA Federation's director of community planning, continuity, culture and overseas affairs.

"I became completely inspired," said recent Birthright participant Judith Zwaigenbaum. "Many [of the 325 Toronto participants thus far] are calling their leaders, saying, 'What can I do to continue this experience?' It has given us encouragement to want to become part of the community again."

Allan Reitzes, the federation's executive vice-president, spoke about issues affecting Ethiopian olim, and Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada, discussed the summer camp in Kiev and the situation of children living near Israel's northern border.

Toronto women greet Queen Mother on her 100th birthday

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The only Canadian Jewish woman known to have spoken to the Queen Mother Elizabeth during her official 100th birthday party in London, England, says she was honoured by the chance to show her respect.

Beverley Lamster Koven of Toronto was representing the Canadian Mothercraft Society, of which she is executive director. She said the parade in front of the royal box slowed down just enough for Koven and her three Mothercraft colleagues to wish the Queen Mother happy birthday and to hear Her Highness and Prince Charles say "thank you very much."

"We were lucky to get that chance," she told The CJN. "The group behind us had 60 ladies and they were bearing down."

The Canadians were invited to participate in the celebrations because the Queen Mother is a patron of Mothercraft, which was established in Toronto in 1931.

The organization – Koven has been executive director for 11 years – has a branch in New Zealand, but none in Britain. It offers research, information and training to families and others involved in child care to support healthy child development.

The parade and reception were held July 19, even though the Queen Mother's birthday is not until Aug. 4.

Wearing khaki skirts and white T-shirts emblazoned with "Canada," the four marchers, led by Koven in a red sweater, carried a banner with Mothercraft and its logo. They were one of the smallest groups to take part in the event, which featured many aspects of British life, including dancers in brief costumes representing rock 'n' roll and other forms of modern entertainment.

"The Queen Mother was too tired to attend the reception" that followed at St. James Palace, the home of the host, Prince Charles, Koven said. But, she added, champagne flowed freely for the 500 guests, and a string quartet played.

On one of her five days in London, Koven had a reunion with her son, Mikel Koven, a professor of film at the University of Wales.

Other Canadians attending the celebration included members of the Black Watch and Scottish regiments and members of the Commonwealth Teachers' Exchange program.

Designer creates Glenn Gould stamp

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In his native Israel, Avi Dunkelman had never heard of Glenn Gould, the brilliant but eccentric Canadian pianist.

Now, the 45-year-old Thornhill resident has produced an evocative tribute to Gould with his winning design of a Canadian postage stamp that pays tribute to the late pianist.

The 46-cent issue measures barely two square inches, but Dunkelman, a graphic designer and instructor at the Ontario College of Art, has managed to use the small space to tell much about Gould and his quirks.

Dunkelman's design was among the winners for Canada Post's 68-stamp Millennium series.

Last year, Dunkelman placed second in a competition to design a stamp in tribute to the Pan-American Games in Winnipeg.

The Gould stamp was also issued for collectors in blocs of four in homage to Canadian musicians, the others depicting Guy Lombardo, Portia White and Felix Leclerc.

"I'm a fan of classical music, so this was a fun project for me," says Dunkelman, a Haifa native who left Israel for Canada in 1977. "It's also a great honour."

To research Gould, Dunkelman contacted the Glenn Gould Foundation, which provided him with sheaves of information and photographs.

Dunkelman's winner is a collage of three images: a silhouette of a 17-year-old Gould dazzling an audience in Moscow; the last studio portrait taken of the pianist, showing him in a pensive pose; and those famous hands in their trademark position, hovering low just above the keyboard.

It's all set against a backdrop of the opening musical bars of J.S. Bach's Goldberg Variations, whose interpretation by Gould brought him worldwide fame.

Canada Post issued one-million of the Gould stamps. The entire Millennium collection is also available in book form.

Interpreting Camp David

How are we to interpret what happened at Camp David? A week ago, Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat returned from there without a signed, final agreement in hand. The 14 days of talks were called a failure. A pall immediately settled over the area as various pundits threw up their hands in despair for the peace process and predicted the possibility of renewed Palestinian violence.

Arafat was greeted by throngs of cheering crowds conveniently awaiting his arrival. He was widely hailed among his people as a hero for having resisted the plea to compromise his claim to complete sovereignty over eastern Jerusalem.

Barak was met at the airport by his wife and the dutiful if not friendly foreign minister David Levy, who extended an official but not warm hand of greeting. The prime minister was not hailed a hero by any Israelis. Rather, most reacted with curiosity, some with caution and the Opposition with calumny, branding him a traitor for having offered any sort of compromise over shared sovereignty. Three motions of non-confidence awaited the exhausted prime minister.

Merely days after the "failed" summit, low-level talks between the Israelis and the Palestinians have resumed. Saeb Erekat and Oded Eran met on the weekend to map out the next steps of the discussions left unresolved at Camp David.

One wonders, however, what next steps the two men are mapping out. What compromises will the two sides be willing to make today that they forcefully and definitively rejected 10 days ago? The situation is indeed intriguing.

Some commentators suggest that these events point to a greater measure of consensus having been reached by the parties at Camp David than has been publicly disclosed. They suggest the deliberate depiction in the Arab world of Yasser Arafat having withstood the demands of the prime minister of Israel and the president of the United States has raised his stature among his people to such a degree that it will enable him in relatively short course to announce a modified compromise of some sort, acceptable to the majority of his people.

While the speculation may be interesting, it is in fact pointless. Whether or not the sides have reached more of an agreement than they have told their respective publics is relevant only in terms of the substance of such an agreement, if it exists. And if the substance of the agreement involves compromises regarding the Old City of Jerusalem, it is incumbent upon the government of Israel to make those known as soon as possible.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

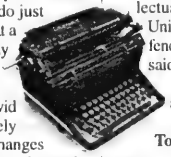
Moderate Mideast forces must align

To those of us who believe in the possibility of peace, the natural response to the failure of the Oslo process to have achieved peace by now is an angry one. We blame Islamic fundamentalism, Hamas bombs, Israeli extremism, the Hebron massacre, Yigal Amir – the forces that have stood as obstacles to the peace process. But in fact the answer is not so simple.

In the Middle East, as in all ethnic conflicts, the key to peace lies in winning over the moderates. It hinges on gaining the support of the silent majority, people who espouse views theoretically supporting peace but say, "While I believe in peace and am prepared to make concessions for peace, how can you trust an enemy who is committed to your destruction?"

Doing so requires significant confidence-building measures that will enable one to recognize the other side's commitment and actively support the peace process. Oslo was originally designed as an attempt to do just that. It was signed with the expectation that a strong alliance of moderates would ultimately lead to a decline in the popularity of extremist factions on both sides.



In the wake of the unresolved Camp David summit, fear and distrust still run extremely high in the region. With all the practical changes that the Oslo process has brought, little has changed on that front. Oslo was built on the recognition that the principle "high fences make good neighbours" is not applicable to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The two societies live among one another. Thousands of Palestinians work within Israel proper, to say nothing of the Israeli-Palestinian Arabs who have representation in the Knesset.

The challenge for Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Chairman Yasser Arafat is to send a joint message that can instil hope and vision among their people. It is time for true confidence-building measures. It is time to get past the rhetoric of conflict, and understand that a successful peace process depends upon the ability to address the concerns of the moderate forces. It is time for Barak and Arafat to tell the Palestinian and Israeli people that it is hopeless to wait for full agreement before aligning themselves with the other side. Rather, they need to agree that only through an alliance between the moderates can a shared vision of the future be forged.

Never leave Jerusalem

When the Romans went into Israel, burned and slaughtered the people, most of the Holy places were ruined. Israel is still mourning the tragedy.

The Jews, who were scattered around the world, suffered persecution and pogroms, which were later followed by the Holocaust.

In 1948, Israel got back a portion of its land and became a small state. Right after this happened, the Arabs attacked. The Jews defended. Much unnecessary blood was shed.

Now the Arabs want back what little is left of Jerusalem? The Jewish people should never leave Jerusalem!

U of T board should be ashamed

I, like many alumni of the University of Toronto, was shocked by the choice of Edward Said as the recipient of an honorary doctorate at the spring convocation of the university.

However, my surprise turned to revulsion when I read a short statement in the Jewish Telegraphic Daily News bulletin of Wednesday, July 19, from New York. It stated: "Professor Threw Stones at Israel: A Palestinian intellectual who is a professor of literature at Columbia University admitted he threw stones at Israel's border fence from Lebanon earlier this month. Edward Said said he was indulging in a harmless act of joy."

The board of the university should be ashamed!

Considers Anne Frank schlock

Re: Stratford production of The Diary of Anne Frank (CJN, July 27). What do Shoah junkies, "anti-Zionists," those who live off the avails of multiculturalism and their fellow travellers in the media, academe, the UN and the religious left, all have in common?

They just love The Diary of Anne Frank. Ahh… the joys of victimhood. It gives them everything they want to believe in about the Jewish stereotype. There's poor old Otto Frank again… with access to weaponry, awaiting the inevitable fate – for the rest of his family, that is. There's young Anne still oozing "hope" that the most misbegotten enemies of the Jewish people might still "cut a bit of slack" after all.

What a role model for combatting our equally misbegotten enemies of the present! Enough already of this anesthetizing "emotionally stretched" schlock.

What they said at Camp David

By ALUF BENN and YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Camp David summit failed because Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat "was afraid to make the necessary historic decisions at this time to bring about the end of the conflict," Prime Minister Ehud Barak stated at the concluding press conference.

This came shortly following President Bill Clinton's announcement, that, after 14 days of "intensive talks," he had "concluded with regret" that Israel and the Palestinians "will not be able to reach an agreement at this time."

Barak said it was Arafat's position on the Jerusalem question that had prevented an agreement. He said the "vision of peace is not dead but has suffered a hard blow at the hands of the Palestinians."

Clinton announced that a senior American official would visit the Middle East in the weeks ahead to assess the possibility of renewing the negotiations. He also called on Barak and Arafat to avert violence and not to take unilateral steps.

Arafat left Washington without making a statement. However, senior Palestinian sources reacted bitterly to the Israeli and American criticism of their negotiating tactics.

Hassan Abdel Rahman, the PLO's representative in Washington, blamed "Israeli intransigence" for the breakdown of the talks. Israel's offer of limited Palestinian sovereignty in Jerusalem was a "non-starter," he said, adding that the Palestinians had insisted on sovereignty over the entire Old City.

A joint statement issued by the three leaders said that Israel and the Palestinians both "commit themselves to continue their efforts to conclude an agreement on all permanent issues as soon as possible."

Pale and clearly exhausted, Clinton said that the fate of Jerusalem proved to be the most intractable issue and that the sides had explored and rejected the possibility of a partial agreement.

The joint statement added that talks should be based on UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 and that the sides should "undertake to create an environment for negotiations free from pressure, intimidation and threats of violence."

In an apparent reference to Arafat's plan to unilaterally declare a Palestinian state on Sept. 13, which the Palestinians could read as a reference to Israeli settlement activity in the territories, the parties said they understood the importance of "avoiding unilateral actions that prejudge the outcome of negotiations, and that their differences will be resolved only by good-faith negotiations."

The breakdown came despite redoubled efforts by Clinton after his return to Camp David from Japan. For two days in a row, Clinton held talks late into the night, Tuesday's ending at 3:15 a.m.

At 3 a.m. Tuesday, Arafat sent a letter to Clinton saying he saw no point in continuing because the Israeli position on Jerusalem could never lead to an agreement, Palestinian sources said.

The summit reached its end following a three-hour meeting between Clinton and the top negotiators for Israel and the Palestinians, Shlomo Ben-Ami and Saeb Erekat, at which the two presented their positions on the Jerusalem issue. When the meeting ended, at 2 a.m. Wednesday, and Ben-Ami briefed Barak on the outcome, it was clear that no agreement would be reached.

Erekat said the Palestinians insisted on full sovereignty over east Jerusalem, which would be the capital of Palestine, with Israel to be given sovereignty over only the Jewish Quarter and a "safe passage" route to the Western Wall.

Ben-Ami proposed the transfer of the Arab neighbourhoods in northern Jerusalem to the Palestinian state, Palestinian administrative rule in the Old City, a Palestinian flag on the Temple Mount with the site to be under Muslim religious control, and free access to the holy places.

Erekat made it plain that this was not enough.

At the subsequent press conference, Clinton said that "significant progress" had been made at the summit, though "under the operating rules that nothing is agreed until everything is agreed, [the sides] are of course not bound by any proposal discussed at the summit."

With an eye on the domestic political scene, Barak emphasized this point more than once in his statement and in replying to questions, noting once that all the positions put forward during the summit meeting were rendered "invalid" by the failure, and again that all the positions were "null and void" and could not be invoked by the Palestinians as a starting point in future negotiations.

He said there were three points on which he would not compromise: "The security of Israel, the sacred values of the Jewish people and the unity of the nation. If we face a choice between undercutting one of these [principles] and entering a confrontation, the choice will be clear to every Israeli."

He added, "If we have to enter a confrontation, we will be able to look our children straight in the eyes and say that we did everything, everything, to prevent that confrontation."

On the Jerusalem issue, Barak confirmed that the Israeli delegation had put forward ideas that would have enlarged and strengthened Jerusalem "beyond anything in its history" by annexing to the city the large Jewish settlements around it. In return, the Palestinians would have been given control of the Arab villages around the city.

Regarding his diplomatic disappointments on both the Syrian and Palestinian fronts, Barak said, "We can look in the mirror and say that in the past year, all the possibilities of bringing about the termination of the conflict between us and the Palestinians were exhausted, but unfortunately the conditions are not yet ripe.

"Israel's positions were given full legitimization by the United States and there is no disputing the fact that Israel was ready to go the full road to achieve peace."

Clinton had special praise for Barak's "courage" in "understanding the historical importance of this moment" and for going beyond past Israeli positions on Jerusalem and the other core issues.

The president said that "the prime minister moved forward from his initial position more than Chairman Arafat," particularly on Jerusalem. However, he noted that Arafat "made it clear that he, too, remains committed to the path of peace."

Barak also moved to deflect anticipated criticism from the left-of-centre camp in Israel. "I understand [the feelings] of many in Israel who believe in coexistence and offering our hand in peace to our neighbours the Palestinians. I share their disappointment, but we will not stop the effort to achieve peace, albeit not at any price."

The prime minister said he would not call early elections. "I do not need a new mandate," he said in reply to a reporter's question. "I did exactly what I told the Israeli public I would do. I was not deterred by the hurdles, the polls or even by the inconvenient situation in the Knesset."

As details of the summit emerged, it was learned that Barak had agreed to accept as a basis for the discussions a proposal made by Clinton to divide the rule of Jerusalem. His consent was conditional on Arafat's accepting the idea as well. Clinton proposed, among other things, that the Christian and Muslim quarters of the Old City be transferred to Palestinian sovereignty, while the Temple Mount remain under Israeli sovereignty but administered by the Palestinian state.

Arafat rejected all the proposals and insisted throughout the summit on full Palestinian sovereignty over the Temple Mount and the Christian and Muslim quarters of the Old City. Barak made clear that he would not compromise sovereignty of the Temple Mount, because it is a "national holy site." Failing to reach agreement on this crucial point, Clinton decided to end the summit.

The trilateral statement

The following is the trilateral statement issued by the United States, Israel and the Palestinians at the end of the Camp David summit:

Between July 11 and 24, under the auspices of President Bill Clinton, Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Chairman Yasser Arafat met at Camp David in an effort to reach an agreement on permanent status.

While they were not able to bridge the gaps and reach an agreement, their negotiations were unprecedented in both scope and detail. Building on the progress achieved at Camp David, the two leaders agreed on the following principles to guide their negotiations:

- The two sides agreed that the aim of their negotiations is to put an end to decades of conflict and achieve a just and lasting peace.
- The two sides commit themselves to continue their efforts to conclude an agreement on all permanent status issues as soon as possible.
- Both sides agree that negotiations based on UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 are the only way to achieve such an agreement and they undertake to create an environment for negotiations free from pressure, intimidation and threats of violence.
- The two sides understand the importance of avoiding unilateral actions that prejudge the outcome of negotiations and that their differences will be resolved only by good-faith negotiations.
- Both sides agree that the United States remains a vital partner in the search for peace and will continue to consult closely with President Clinton and Secretary Madeleine Albright in the period ahead.

The Shoah in American life

Some time ago, I read Eva Hoffman's book review discussing a work by Peter Novick, The Holocaust in American Life. Since so much had been written about the Shoah at the time, I refrained from commenting on it. But a recent article in Germany's leading newspaper on the subject led me to have another look at it.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The author considers the fact that as late as the 1950s and '60s, the Shoah was not a significant subject of discussion even in the Jewish community and there were no museums or monuments dedicated to its memory. Novick believes that — at least in the United States — this was in part due to Jewish worry of possible accusations of dual loyalty, for a discussion of the Holocaust inevitably led to the role of American and other western countries during the 1930s and '40s vis-a-vis Jewish persecution.

At the same time, the embattled position of Israel and the new identification of Jews with Israel's fate seemed to constrain an emphasis on Jewish faith and identity. Things changed after the Six Day War and with a strengthening of Jewish self-esteem in the Diaspora, the Holocaust became a major concern.

Novick discusses a remark American politician Jesse Jackson made in 1979, that he was "sick and tired of hearing about the Holocaust," and the somewhat related discussion by Israeli author Boas Evron, who in 1983 said that awareness of the Holocaust did not really further an understanding of the past, but had become a manipulation of the present. With the growth of Jewish economic well-being, a move from the political left toward the right and the rise of Jewish neo-conservatism, concentration on the Holocaust became a function of Jewish identity, a means of defence against inimical critique and thus an aspect of self-immunization.

Novick's book is not a polemical treatise, but it certainly has elicited the discussion of contrasting themes. In the course of this debate about the meaning of the Holocaust, it has become evident that a remembrance of the past no longer stands alone. It must be combined with a discussion of how it is being perceived and whether it is moving to the centre of awareness.

There are some people who claim that the Holocaust stands more in the centre of American cultural life than the Civil War, and that more Americans know about the Shoah than about Pearl Harbour or the dropping of the atomic bomb on Hiroshima. I do not know whether it is so, but if that should be the case, it would certainly be a subject of keen interest and worthy of study.

One year later

In her fourth year of university, Talia (Tammy) McLaughlin is majoring in history, political science and publishing. She is currently the editor of the Hillel newspaper, HaKesher, and the chair of the Torah and Mitzvah Fund of the Beth Israel Synagogue Sisterhood. I asked her to write this column soon after she returned from Israel as a Birthright participant.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

When I asked her to tell me about her first year of Jewish life, this was her reply:

* * *

It is hard to know where to begin, she said. My Jewish life began with the waters of the mikvah as much as it did six years and nine rabbis ago when I read my first book on Judaism.

My beit din one year ago was a process of letting go, as well as a test of my knowledge and acceptance of Jewish practices. Yet it was the mikvah with its warm waters that passed over, under and around me that served to truly usher me into my Jewish life. It is those few minutes that I remember with such clarity. In that small space of time, I slid into my new life that occasionally amazes me with its differences. My first year as Talia has been one of simple changes, experienced with both tears and laughter.

It was my chance trip to Israel that brought about the biggest change. The Old City of Jerusalem with its narrow winding streets. The hot and barren desert of the Negev. The cosmopolitan city of Tel Aviv on the edge of the Mediterranean Sea. I will always be intrigued by the tenacity of this nation of people fighting to survive, as easily seen in desert kibbutzim with green groves as in soldiers with guns on Israeli borders. It was in such a diverse place that I was able to realize that I, too, could fit into a corner of the Jewish world without the shyness and marginality of "the convert" as before; I was simply another Jew.

I remind myself of this simple bit of wisdom when in my synagogue I slowly stumble through prayers and pages, or in social circles when I smile in cryptic explanation of my Irish last name. I have become part of my synagogue and university Jewish communities with happiness, both in undertaking new responsibilities and in acquiring new friends.

Yet I will always wonder if I will ever pass the "Jewish radar test," as one rabbi called the instinctive knowing of being in the presence of another Jew. In other words, I wonder if my Jewishness has become an intrinsic part of my actions as much as it has become a part of my thinking.

It is in the months of winter that this idea takes hold of me, because I do miss parts of my past life that are rare memories of my childhood – the twinkling lights strung around bushes and houses at the beginning of November, the carols sung ad nauseam at Christmas time, the family dinners that were not yet invaded by my choice of a different path.

My life will forever be divided into two distinct phases of before and after I became Jewish, which demand and need to be finely balanced. As difficult as my task is at times, it is as if I am seeing the world through new eyes, and as I navigate this new path, I must chuckle at my odd circumstance.

Yet for those times that I still feel shyly "the gentile" in my mistakes and lack of knowledge, I keep my conversion papers tucked away for the small reminder that I have created my own life, safe, loving and filled with simple joy as another unique member of the Jewish people. I will live, God willing, the next 50 years, slowly learning the jokes, the recipes, the Yiddishisms and the communalism of a Jewish life and culture that will both enhance and maintain my quiet faith.

It is an exciting prospect, and one that makes me grin from ear to ear.

Suffering not good motivation for Judaism

I was recently in an Orthodox shul that apparently has a noise problem. Congregants are seemingly more interested in talking about business than they are in davening – prayer. Copies of the following leaflet appeared in the shul prior to Shabbat: "We have seen so much tragedy, so much suffering... Won't you stop talking now?... It's time to Daven! Talk to HaShem, not to your friends!"

Bruce Elman in Windsor

Now, I am not unsympathetic to the purpose behind the notice. I certainly agree that this shul has a terrible problem with noise. It is often difficult to hear the chazzan's davening from the men's section let alone the women's. It is disturbing to those who are serious about prayer. It inhibits one's ability to daven with true kavanah – spiritual commitment. I am just not convinced that this particular appeal will do much good.

It reminds me of a morning minyan I once attended at a junior high school. The students were particularly uninspired by and generally uninvolved in the prayers. One teacher, who was – quite properly – disturbed by the students' behaviour interrupted the service.

She told the students that there had been a story in the newspaper that day about the construction of a Holocaust memorial in Berlin. Many German government officials had attended a ceremony to mark the significance of this memorial, but the mayor of Berlin had boycotted the proceedings because he did not want to have a Holocaust memorial built in his city.

Furthermore, the teacher told the students that even today, there were many people who were anti-Semites and would deny the Holocaust. So, they should stop fooling around and take the prayers seriously!

Once again, I sympathized with the teacher's intent. The students, generally, were making a mockery of the service and some attempt had to be made to get them back on track. But once again, this particular message will not – in the long run at least – solve the problem.

The fact is that any rational person hearing these messages would probably reason: "We've been davening for thousands of years. What do we have to show for it? 'So much tragedy, so much suffering.' In that case, why daven at all?"

And what of the pupils in the school? It seems to me that a child, or even a teenager, confronted continuously with stories of catastrophe and sorrow, would certainly conclude that, if so many people dislike us and want to harm us, perhaps it's better – or at least safer – not to be Jewish at all!

We seem to have lost the correct paradigm to explain the importance of Judaism. In order to place Judaism in its proper context, we should emphasize triumph over tragedy, freedom over slavery, blessings over curses, celebration over suffering and sanctity over sorrow.

In our dealings with young people, we must learn that tales of tragedy and suffering, catastrophe and sorrow, will not motivate them to lead a serious Jewish life. Joy and gladness, prosperity and fulfilment, blessings and thanksgiving, triumph and exultation, family and community, these are reasons to be serious about our davening, these are reasons to lead a committed Jewish life!

I once heard a Conservative rabbi give a High Holy Day sermon in which he told parents that, if they were going to bring their children to the synagogue only three times a year, they should not bring them on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Rather, he suggested they should bring them to synagogue on Simchat Torah and Shabbat Chanukah and Purim! He was right, of course, because when the children see the joy and happiness, the triumph and the thanksgiving, they will want to return to the synagogue over and over again.

The leaflet in shul should have read: "We have witnessed the triumph of the Jewish people, we have so much to celebrate! It is time to daven! Give thanks to HaShem!"

The Kirshner File

Germany and Israel forge close relations

Last September, Ehud Barak, Israel's prime minister, became the first foreign leader to visit Berlin – Germany's old-new capital – on official business. Charged with historic symbolism, Barak's trip was, as he put it, tangible evidence of the important relationship between "the new, democratic Germany and the State of Israel that emerged from the ashes of the Holocaust."

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Thirty-five years after Israel and Germany formally established diplomatic ties, Germany today is Israel's closest friend after the United States. It is not by chance that Israel's new embassy in Berlin, scheduled to be opened in September, will be its largest in Europe.

Germany's special relations with Israel, and its treatment of its thriving Jewish community, stem from a desire to cleanse itself of the stain of Nazism. Beyond this compelling historical imperative, Israel and Germany are bonded by common western values, though policy disagreements occasionally flare up.

It may sound odd, but as Israel's former foreign minister, Abba Eban, has observed, no other country, with the exception of the United States, has done more to strengthen Israel than Germany. "We are aware of our special responsibility for the security of the Jewish state," Johannes Rau, Germany's president, told the American Jewish Committee recently. Germany's relationship with Israel, he declared, is "a cornerstone" of its foreign policy.

Across the board, from trade and tourism to cultural, scientific and military exchanges, Israel and Germany are bound together inextricably by a web of strong personal, political and institutional networks. "It really astonishes me," said a German diplomat in charge of the Israel desk at the foreign ministry in Berlin. "It's a close, very reliable relationship."

"Our history melds us together," said David Walzer, Israel's acting ambassador to Germany. "The shadow of the past will always be there, but both sides are trying to build bridges of understanding."

Politically, as Walzer pointed out, Germany is the engine that powers Israel's drive for closer links with the European Union (EU). Thanks to a German initiative, Israel was granted "privileged status" in the EU in 1994. And in 1999, under Germany's presidency, the EU signed a scientific and technical agreement with Israel. When Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder met with Barak last year, he promised to enhance Israel's economic position in the EU. And, Walzer added, Germany sought to soften the provisions of a 1998 EU edict to boycott goods produced by Israel in the disputed territories. On another front, Germany worked with the United States in May to gain membership for Israel in the United Nations' West European regional group.

In addition, Germany has been helpful in arranging exchanges of deceased Israeli soldiers and Arab guerrillas, and has played a role in trying to find downed Israeli navigator Ron Arad. Several weeks ago, Germany offered asylum to 400 members of the South Lebanon Army, which disintegrated following Israel's precipitous withdrawal from southern Lebanon on May 24.

Economically, Israel is Germany's biggest trading partner in the Middle East. The current volume of trade stands at $2.5 billion (US), excluding military sales. Israel's chief exports are high-tech products and machinery, computer software, medical equipment, agricultural produce and Dead Sea minerals. Israel buys German cars and trucks, industrial equipment and household electronic goods.

Germany's investments in Israel are growing, judging by the entry of Volkswagen, Siemens and Daimler-Chrysler into the Israeli marketplace. German companies helped build a new rail line from Tel Aviv to Haifa.

Although both sides are reluctant to discuss the topic, military relations, including intelligence co-operation in the field of anti-terrorism, are on the upswing. Germany has bought Uzi submachine guns from Israel, while Israel has purchased German tank engines for its fleet of Merkava tanks. The chiefs of staff of the Israeli and German armies have visited each other. German and Israeli soldiers have participated in joint exercises.

Embarrassed by the disclosure that German companies illegally transferred sophisticated technology to Iraq before the 1991 Gulf War, Germany dispatched Patriot missiles and gas masks to Israel, then agreed to deliver three Dolphin-class submarines to the Israeli navy.

Scientific, cultural and academic relations are on a high level. "They have developed quite well," said Walzer, who was posted to the Israeli embassy in Ottawa for several years starting in the late 1980s. Some 80 Israeli and German towns and cities are twinned. In youth exchanges, Israel ranks third behind France and Poland. One hundred and eighty thousand German tourists visited Israel last year, second only to Americans.

From Willy Brandt and Helmut Kohl to Yitzhak Rabin and Benjamin Netanyahu, German and Israeli politicians pay each other regular visits. "Germany's decision-makers know Israel personally," said a German diplomat who served in Tel Aviv. "They have an understanding of Israeli thinking on a wide range of issues." Indeed, the Israel-German friendship league is dwarfed by only those of France and the United States.

Germany and Israel exchanged ambassadors on May 12, 1965 – 15 years after the first formal meeting between Israeli and German parliamentarians in Istanbul, 13 years after the two nations signed a restitution accord in Luxembourg, and five years after David Ben-Gurion, Israel's prime minister, met with his German counterpart, Konrad Adenauer, in New York City. Since the early 1950s, Israel has received billions of dollars in German reparation payments, and until last year, Israel was the recipient of a separate aid package of about $100 million annually. These funds contributed to Israel's stability and survival in its critical formative years. Prior to the Six Day War, Germany shipped a whole host of weaponry, notably tanks, to Israel.

For all the warmth, tensions, some severe, have surfaced in the past four decades. Israel protested the presence of German rocket scientists in Egypt before they were removed.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder inspect a German honour guard in Berlin in September 1999.

At Israel's insistence, Germany extended the statute of limitations for Nazi crimes. Under Israeli pressure, Germany cancelled the sale of Leopard 2 tanks to Saudi Arabia. In 1981, Menachem Begin lambasted Helmut Schmidt over a speech in which he endorsed Palestinian national rights.

During the first half of the 1990s, a variety of problems roiled the waters, from the sale of German dual-use technology to Iraq to an upsurge of neo-Nazism and anti-Semitism on the heels of Germany's reunification. Germany's view of Israeli settlements in the territories as illegal under international law has ruffled feathers in Jerusalem, but its support of Palestinian self-determination is no longer a hot-button issue in Israel. In a declaration approved in Berlin in April 1999, the EU issued its strongest statement yet on behalf of Palestinian statehood.

Germany supports the Oslo peace process, and, according to Walzer, has tried, without success so far, to revive the multilateral track.

In Ramallah, Germany has opened a representative office accredited to the Palestinian Authority (PA). German and EU aid to the PA totals $120 million per annum. German assistance projects in the Palestinian autonomous areas include a desalination plant in Gaza, a sewage system in Bethlehem and Nablus, and an industrial park in Jenin. It's clear that, in Germany, the Palestinians have found a sympathetic partner.

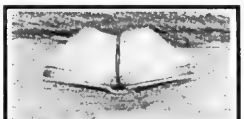
Exploring Tisha b'Av

By RABBI MOSHE J. YERES

Parshat Devarim, Shabbat Chazon, always occurs immediately prior to Tisha b'Av, and this year it begins on Wednesday evening Aug. 9.

The Emperor Napoleon is purported to have visited a synagogue on the night of Tisha b'Av. Watching the multitude of Jewish worshippers seated on the floor, mournfully chanting and crying the dirges of Eichah and Kinot, he was very taken and is said to have remarked that a people that can continue for 18 centuries to observe a national day of mourning and sadness will surely survive forever.



Rabbinic Reflections

The Jewish people have survived for so long not simply through despair and mourning, but rather on account of a positive Jewish identity.

Yet it cannot be discounted that many of our people search out a rabbi and synagogue just to say Kaddish. I have not studied the statistics, but years of my service in the rabbinate brings to mind faces of Jews whose initial connection to faith and commitment began or was renewed when they first came for Kaddish or Yizkor.

Yet if death and mourning tend to be the draw for modern Jews to attend shul, then why is Tisha b'Av today not attended with greater intensity, both in numbers and in feeling? Why is it that Tisha b'Av just doesn't have the same feeling as Pesach or Shabbat? Why is the Kinot text less popular than the Haggadah? Is it just the matzah balls or cholent that we feel are missing?

Part of the answer is that we find it difficult and painful to picture the violence, starvation, upheaval, exile and utter despair that accompanied the destruction of both Temples in Jerusalem, as well as the other pogroms, persecutions and Crusades that have affected Jewish history.

After all, these are not very pretty things to think about, and some of the kinot are fairly graphic. True, the Exodus does have its share of destruction, but the stress in its midrashim is not on the gore. And besides, at Pesach it was we who were saved from the plagues and the Red Sea through miracles.

Another part of the answer, I suspect, is that we are all sort of comfortable in our Diaspora, and we are really not all that anxious to recreate a Beit Mikdash-centred faith to replace the Judaism of 5760.

Many of us have gotten quite used to celebrating Pesach at five-star resorts. How many of us honestly would feel excited about shlepping the Passover lamb to Jerusalem to shuffle in line with every other Jewish family in order to join a mega-kiddush barbecue on Har Habayit?

I believe the real reason, though, is that Tisha b'Av tends to raise more questions than it answers. Why did the Almighty allow this terrible destruction to occur, and then have it recur a second time? And if it was for the theological reasons suggested by the prophets, then what does that portend for us today?

Have we suddenly become such a righteous nation not to fear with apprehension religious catastrophe and churban (destruction) again? And can we really comprehend the reason for churban Habayit?

We can search to try to find solace and comfort for individual mourners grappling with loss, but what can we say when it affects an entire people? The perplexing problem of tzadik v'ra lo – good and evil – is brought on Tisha b'Av to the forefront of our historical and religious experience and remains unanswered and unresolved.

But that may be the very reason to come to say the Tisha b'Av Kinot – because the common point of all these elegies in the Kinot is the didactic argument that man makes to the Almighty about His decree. While accepting God's judgment and decree as final and correct (lecha Hashem hatzedakah), there remains the nagging and perplexing question – why God do you appear to be removed (lamah ta'amod berachok)? This question is asked over and over again in the Kinot.

The Kinot offers a recognition of our faults, yet it wonders out loud if the punishment exceeds the wrong committed. The questions of Eichah have not been answered, and so we ask them to the Almighty over and over again. Kinot, therefore, gives expression to the dialectical nature of the relationship between the Almighty and the Jewish people.

Our tefillot explore both sides of this special relationship, and through the medium of Kinot, we come to grips with our own iniquities and also give vent to our frustrations.

FATHER AND SON CHAVRUTAH: — Students from the Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad enjoyed prayers and Torah recently as fathers and sons studied together in the chavrutah (paired study) style. The study session was part of a Father and Son Brunch held in honor of Shavuoth, the holiday that commemorates the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai 3,300 years ago.

Jewish distance learning

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You've dreamed of studying at an Israeli university but never had the chance. Or maybe you feel that it's time to join a regular Jewish studies class but can't make the commitment to show up on the same night every week. Well, there is an alternative. Now you can be part of a virtual classroom that's as far away as your keyboard. Today: Jewish distance learning on the World Wide Web.

First, an overview of how these courses operate: Some are self-directed and you follow prescribed courses at your own pace. Others use live, classroom-based video conferencing that allows students and instructors to communicate directly with each other, face-to-face. Still others are conducted via e-mail and a Web site. The instructor posts a lecture or assignment on the Web. Participants have a few days to do the required work. This is followed by a virtual class discussion, usually conducted via an e-mail list.

Classes are often free. However, courses that are offered by degree-granting universities normally charge a fee. Access to online materials in those courses is usually restricted to enrolled students who have a password. Most universities view their distance learning courses as equal in workload and as demanding as their classroom-based courses, and offer comparable credits.

Bar-Ilan University offers a wide assortment of courses guaranteed to challenge and stimulate [http://www.barilan. edu/courses.html]. This year you can delve into the Judean Desert Scrolls with Dr. Hanan Eshel. Dr. David Elgavish looks at War and Peace in the Bible, starting with Abraham and following the exploits of Joshua and King David. And for something a bit more peaceful, join Prof. Edwin Seroussi as he introduces you to Music in Traditional Jewish Culture and Society where he compares and contrasts "Jewish music in its diverse forms across the cultural bounds of Ashkenazi, Moroccan, Yemenite, Turkish and many other communities." These credit courses cost $360 (US) or you can sit in and audit them for $180 each. The next semester starts Sept. 17.

The Jewish Theological Seminary runs what seems to be a very sophisticated and well-designed site [http://courses.jtsa.edu/]. Credit courses at the Distance Learning Project include Introduction to Talmud, Methods of Teaching Prayer, Reintroduction to the Bible and Women in Rabbinic Literature. Jewish educators can participate in these courses at a reduced fee without receiving the course credits. There are also shorter two-month non-credit courses such as Talking about God, Finding Spirituality in Prayer and Teshuvah as Worship. Also check out the free courses and children's educational courses at learn@jts [http://learn.jtsa.edu/].

How did Christianity cease to be a form of Judaism? What were the forces that made Christianity so antagonistic toward Judaism through the millennia? How should Jews relate to this religion? Those are some of the provocative questions that you could discuss and debate if you joined the cyber-class at Baltimore's jewishstudiesonline.com [http://jewishstudiesonline.com/].

Hebrew College in Brookline, Mass., is accredited by the New England Association of Schools and Colleges and is authorized to offer bachelor's and master's degrees in Jewish studies and Jewish education [http://hebrewcollege.edu]. Recent courses include Individual and Communal Responsibility to the Vulnerable, The Israel Dimension in Jewish Education, Using the Internet for Jewish Education and Finding Your Voice: A Cross-Cultural/Interfaith Writing Workshop.

Chicago's Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies offers distance learning for its master's and doctoral programs in Jewish studies and Jewish education [http://www.spertus.edu/College/MJS/Dist_Lrn.html]. Course packages include audio/video tapes, reading materials, a course curriculum and assignments. Distance learners are encouraged to be in regular contact with their program advisor by phone, fax or e-mail. And for a real personal feeling, distance learners are expected to spend at least five or six days a year at the Spertus home campus in Chicago.

Next time, we'll check out some free distance learning courses and look at how distance learning technology is helping hospitalized children in Israel continue their studies.

'Good gets good back'

The Perfect System*, by Syd Kessler, Stoddart, $26.95.

At the age of 30, Syd Kessler of Toronto was already a millionaire. His creative and innovative talent as a writer for radio commercials led to quick and unusual success. At one point, a company in which he was a partner controlled 68 percent of all Canadian broadcast advertising.

Books
Bernard Baskin

He writes, "I was wealthy and influential, had a great wife, two amazing kids, a beautiful home, and all the other trappings and distractions that money could buy. But – and clichés become clichés because they're true – inside I felt empty. It was a classic case: here I was with everything I had worked so hard to attain, yet I had never felt less fulfilled."

Then, after a six-year period of unhappiness he fell victim to a series of debilitating ailments and a protracted period of convalescence. He saw his career founder and his business wither away. Eventually, he was able to establish new business relationships on a more modest level in the field of cybertechnology.

Out of these vicissitudes – and much reflection and study, especially in the field of Kabbalah – the author has fashioned a philosophy of living that he calls "the Perfect System."

The principles that he advocates seem simple, practical and essentially religious in nature. Starting with the scientific premise that the physical universe is a result of a first cause, an explosion that moved outwards into space and time, he asserts that the world is governed by inflexible and unassailable rules.

"Even when we don't see any cause and effect link, we must remind ourselves that it is always present, always in play. Every action – good, bad, ugly, or indifferent – generates a consequence, a reaction, according to its nature. This is a major component in the basic laws of physics, but it's also a rule that affects us. Never forget that this system is perfect. It is not arbitrary and it doesn't make mistakes."

It is our failure to grasp the laws of cause and effect that creates chaos in our lives and in our world.

With apt illustrations from his life and experience, Kessler provides rich insights on such themes as, "our thoughts have power," "limitations of the five senses," "everything is in the seed," "no pain, no gain," and "energy is infinite."

When the author is unsure of what to do in any situation he asks himself two questions before acting. First, "How would I want to be treated in the same situation?" And then, "What good will it do?"

He asserts that the good must be to others first, not to yourself, that nothing good can come from an action that is not focused first on the betterment of another person. He maintains that we all want to be treated with respect, forgiveness and compassion, and believes beyond all doubt, that good gets good back – and vice versa.

Some readers will find Kessler's ideas about human nature and behaviour rather simplistic and over-optimistic, and the scientific framework in which the ideas are enfolded irrelevant. Others, however, in search of a pattern of workable values, will find this slender volume a helpful and valuable approach to more successful living.

Dreams and Fantasies: senior's view of youth's imagination

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Toronto artist Miklos Emhecht's whimsical and mythological paintings and poems are on exhibit at the Children's Own Museum (COM) at 90 Queen's Park, until Aug. 31.

Titled Dreams and Fantasies, the exhibition demonstrates the 78-year-old's vivid imagination and understanding of the unbounded visualizations of youngsters. Each painting is accompanied by a short poem.

Asked about his fantasy-like paintings, he says, "I feel like a child at heart. Many years were taken away from us in Europe – the war, communism. In every tragic situation, you must find a spark of humour to survive, like looking in a distorted mirror because jokes, antidotes and humour depict the truth."

With a rose in his lapel, the artist, humourist, composer, lyricist and lecturer could be taken for an English gentleman.

But his gentlemanly demeanour belies his wit and youthful outlook on life. Emhecht prides himself as being the oldest person (according to United Way) to have climbed the CN Tower's 1,800 steps, a feat he accomplished in 23 minutes.

He advises young people to "discover and see beauty, kindness and compassion in your surroundings and in the persons you meet" and to "learn how to listen."

He also emphasizes the need for creative thinking. "Imagination drove mankind ahead," he says.

Born and educated in Budapest, Hungary, Emhecht came to Canada after the revolution against the Communist regime in 1956.

Emhecht's interest in art developed during his childhood. When he was nine, he wrote a four-line poem and won a nationwide competition for students. At age 11, he wrote the lyrics and music to a song and entered a national student competition. He won first prize.

Miklos Emhecht

After seeing a large panoramic work by 19th-century painter Arpad Feszty titled The Taking of Hungary, the then 15-year-old Emhecht recalls being "dazed."

"I went to a park with my mandolin and in one sitting, wrote an entire symphony titled Turanian Fantasia [The Hungarians]."

It took 62 years before the symphony was premiered at a concert in Toronto sponsored by the Canadian Embassy of the Republic of Hungary, he adds.

Artist inspired by Judaism

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Suzy Tanzer has found a creative way to express her connection to Judaism – through Judaic art.

Tanzer, 36, is an award-winning textile and fabric artist who specializes in designing items such as chupahs, torah covers, Ark curtains and tallitot.

Biblical stories, mysticism and Jewish artifacts have spurred her creative juices. Her recent project, an Ark curtain with an intricate array of multi-coloured leaves, was inspired by the biblical notion of the tree of life.

"I'm drawn to vibrant colours and natural imagery," she said. 'There's a lot of natural imagery in the Bible."

The colourful curtain, which took 350 hours to complete, now covers Torahs inside Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue's Aron Kodesh.

Tanzer did not plan to enter the Judaic art industry. After a short stint as an independent filmmaker in the early '90s – she wrote, directed and produced Vanishing Points, a 20-minute drama that aired on CBC – she itched for a more personal, hands-on and less chaotic career.

"They say the film industry isn't for the faint at heart," she said. "I guess I'm not faint at heart."

After receiving compliments on furniture she painted as a hobby and with her knack for sewing, she decided to study material art and design at the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD), and textiles at Sheridan College.

Around the time Tanzer entered OCAD in 1994, she attended a week-long camp for Jewish adults at the National Havurah Institute in the New England area.

Jewish observance, something she was not raised with, quickly became an inspiration for her art work and life.

Although inspired by Judaism, Tanzer notes her art is a personal expression and may veer away from traditional Jewish principles.

For instance, a tallit she stitched was decorated with special light blue fabric to symbolize water. "My idea of prayer and meditation is nature. I brought that idea to the tallit."

She said her work is "bringing a new sensibility to Judaic art, one that's willing to push the envelope. It's less traditional, more innovative."

And the response has been positive, she said. A stark-white Torah cover she designed using old family linens, silk organza and silk duppioni has been entered into the world-renowned Spertus Museum Exhibition in Chicago.

Like many artists, Tanzer comes from a family of creative and artistic people. Her mother, Margaret, used to design sweaters, and her father, Sigfried, was a photographer. Her sister, Kathy Hart, currently works as a Judaic metalsmith.

But Tanzer warns that having art in the genes isn't enough to be successful. "It's like Einstein said. 'Being a genius is one percent inspiration and 99 percent perspiration."

Harry Pollock's lifelong passion for James Joyce undimmed at 80

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What would attract a good Jewish boy from Toronto to an abstruse Irish writer like James Joyce?

"Sex," says Harry Pollock flatly. "I had heard that Joyce's writing contained explicit sexual material, and I wasn't allowed to read it. Nobody tells me what's not allowed if it doesn't harm anyone else."

Pollock's initial prurient interest in the author of Dubliners, Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man and Ulysses resulted in a lifetime of study and fascination. No dilettante, Pollock is widely regarded as one of the world's foremost Joycean scholars, no mean feat considering that Ulysses, despite its brain-bruising experimentalist style, was voted by literature experts late last year as the greatest novel of the 20th century.

Now, on his 80th birthday and with his passion for Joyce as undimmed as ever, Pollock can indulge in some of the fulsome praise that has come his way, including one plaudit that termed him "possibly the keenest James Joyce fan in the world."

Five years ago, York University recognized his self-taught skills with an honorary doctor of letters degree.

All not bad for someone whose formal education ended with a high school diploma from Harbord Collegiate Institute in 1939. Even so, "they stamped me for life," Pollock recalls of his salad days as a student. "They made me aware of a wider world."

Good thing, for his well-rounded training made him a true renaissance man: teacher, journalist, actor, playwright, novelist, poet and theatre director, not to mention founder of Toronto's Temple Sinai, and founder and (still) president of the Canadian James Joyce Society.

He's 80, but a young 80, and can still flex his considerable prowess. Opening Joyce's impossibly intractable Finnegans Wake, said to be the most difficult book in the English language, Pollock slowly but methodically unravels the puns, mutli-layered foreign words, portmanteaus, and dreamy, stream-of-consciousness meanderings with the ease of an Oxford don.

Harry Pollock

Joyce "opened up so much for me," he told The CJN in his book-lined study. "He led me to the Bible, to languages…to so much I love."

The Dublin Joyce both revered and reviled is a far cry from Pollock's birthplace, the Polish shtetl of Opatow, near Kielce. He was brought to Toronto at age five by his father, a penurious cobbler who had settled earlier in Kensington Market. The young Pollock took an instant liking to mythology and tales of adventure.

But his first jobs out of school were menial, grinding lenses (like Jewish philosopher Baruch Spinoza, he points out) and buffing plastic combs. During World War II, he never left town, serving with a Royal Canadian Air Force training command on York Street.

At war's end, Pollock began using his talent, becoming an advertising copy writer for a safety supply company. With two partners, he later opened his own ad agency, penning copy that hustled everything from pickles to hosiery.

"But all this time, my mind was somewhere else," Pollock recalls, "in the world of James Joyce, of language, stories, novels and literary criticism." His interest in Joyce had been piqued by the banning of Ulysses in the United States, which cited obscenity laws. A U.S. court lifted the ban in 1933 but prudish Canadian customs officials were seizing copies for years after.

Pollock began reading it in bits and pieces at a precocious 18, and finally smuggled a copy into Canada from New York in a suitcase's false bottom. The work thrilled him, for here was the tale of a day in the life of Leopold Bloom, a Jewish advertising salesman (note the resemblance) who wanders the streets of Dublin for 20 hours and encounters Jewish brothel keepers, drunken, anti-Semitic louts and assorted mythic-like figures. And here was his lusty wife, Molly, who cuckolds him, and whose famous orgasmic soliloquy ending the book ("Yes I said yes I will Yes.") nailed down its lascivious reputation. The book was just as steamy as Pollock had hoped.

Joyce's masterpiece, in turn, led him to Homer's ancient epics Iliad and Odyssey (on which Ulysses was modelled) and to Irish history and its pain.

Pollock began a torrent of activity, starting with an address to the prestigious James Joyce Society in New York. In 1964, he set up a Canadian society, and secured leading figures in the field for presentations. (At the First International James Joyce Symposium, held in Dublin, Pollock even got drunk with Joyce's son, Georgio.)

Fulfilling another dream, he got to play Leopold Bloom in a 1966 Toronto stage production of Ulysses in Nighttown.

Pollock was used to the classroom – he'd taught at Holy Blossom Temple's religious school – so it was a natural progression for him to be asked to teach Joyce to undergraduates at York University's Stong College in 1969. Here was someone who never attended university being asked to teach at one. He gave up business and never looked back. The relationship with York would last nearly 30 years through several courses, including creative writing.

Which he did, in spades. He's authored five plays adapted from sections of Ulysses and other Joyce texts; a book of poems, The He and the She of It; countless newspapers reviews and travel pieces; television scripts and radio documentaries; and is now putting the finishing touches to Anna's Journal, the third novel in a trilogy that began with Gabriel (1975) and Max (1997). The final instalment, he says, will sum up "the combination of the sacred and profane in my own life."

In between, Pollock found time to personally correspond with media guru Marshall McLuhan and Irish dramatist Samuel Beckett, not to mention the top Joyce scholars in the world.

He's been married to the same woman for going on 56 years, Vera (née Bacal). They have a son, a daughter and one grandchild.

The question Jewish readers of Joyce may have is this: why did the author make the greatest character in modern literature a Jew?

"Joyce had many Jewish friends," Pollock explains. "He studied languages and the Bible, and knew some Hebrew words. He probably had a sympathy for Jews, but he needed to construct a typical 'wandering Jew' who lives in an alien world. He did that in Bloom."

Joyce once said, perhaps mischievously, that he put enough mind-bending knots into his books to keep professors busy for a hundred years. Harry Pollock has loved every minute.

Government lies were greatest disappointment

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lies to the Jewish people by both the Liberals and Progressive Conservative parties have been the greatest disappointment of his career, said Ben Kayfetz, former director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Ben Kayfetz

"The leaders of either party knew they were lying when they promised to take action on Nazi war criminals. The reason for this was that in 1948, Canada signed an agreement to halt action on war criminals. This was a move in the Cold War that no one outside government knew of until decades afterwards.

"We were deliberately and knowingly lied to all those years," Kayfetz said at a luncheon marking the 40th anniversary of the New Fraternal Jewish Association (NFJA).

The most satisfying achievement of his long career, he said, was the enactment of anti-discrimination laws.

The NFJA was born after the murder of Yiddish writers in the Soviet Union was exposed, said Sidney Blinick, acting president of the association. "At the time, many Jewish leaders said we [NFJA] would last a maximum of three years."

The NFJA broke away from the United Jewish Peoples Order when "its domination by the Communist party became evident," he said.

The Yiddish and popular singer, Lenka Lichtenberg, who had just returned from the Czech Republic, entertained.

Although he has never taken professional lessons, Nisimov says he has learned a lot from his mother and from watching an Israeli television program about drawing cartoons.

He plans on attending an art college and hopes some day to work in an animation studio. "If I can draw, I should do something with it."

Becoming an artist, he says, "requires a small bit of talent and a lot of practice. Everyone has the talent, they just need to like to draw and have the desire to work hard at it."

Nisimov has returned to The CJN this summer as a cartoonist and illustrator.

They may have the opportunity to meet Rosa Parks herself, Gosling said. Before the visit to the Holocaust Memorial Centre, the youngsters will learn about the background and significance of the Holocaust, as well as the importance of the memorial and the role of survivors.

They will discuss how the Holocaust affected the Jewish community and society as a whole. They will also meet with survivors.

After the two programs, the participants will discuss how the trips affected them, and what they thought similar programs could accomplish for others.

Gosling said that "we want these young people to take leadership roles – we hope they will be champions of racial harmony."

Recipes make good gifts

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I love to share recipes with family and friends. I write out the recipes, place them in plastic sheets that fit into a binder, and give them as part of a first apartment or shower gift. I try and tailor the remaining part of the gift to go with the recipe. A roasting pan with a recipe for brisket, a rolling pin, cookie sheet and measuring cups with a cookie recipe, or a cake platter and a recipe for chocolate cake.

TENDER BEEF BRISKET WITH ONIONS

1 brisket (about 7 to 8 lb.)
4 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. paprika
8 to 10 large onions, sliced (about 3 lb.)
2 cups water

Preheat oven to 325. In large roasting pan, place the brisket, fat side up. Season the brisket with the garlic, salt, pepper and paprika. Place the sliced onions on top and around the brisket, then pour the water around meat. Place the roasting pan on a stovetop and bring the mixture to a boil (keep uncovered). Place the roast in the oven and roast, uncovered, for 2 hours, turning the roast over occasionally, each time spooning the onions back onto meat. Roast, covered, for 4 hours longer or until very tender. Remove from oven and let cool; cover and refrigerate overnight. Skim off fat. Trim fat from meat; slice thinly. To serve, arrange meat on platter, mounding onions over top. Yield: 16 servings.

Note: This roast can be made a day ahead. The flavour actually improves on reheating.

APRICOT CHICKEN

2 chickens cut in 8ths
½ cup apricot jam
1 tbsp. white vinegar
2 cloves garlic, thinly sliced
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1½ tsp. cornstarch
1 tbsp. cold water

In a bowl mix together everything but the chicken. Place the chicken pieces in baking dish and pour the glaze over the top. Cover and refrigerate 2 hours.

Preheat oven to 350. Bake uncovered for 1½ hours making sure to baste the chicken with the sauce twice. Serves 4 to 6. This can be doubled or tripled.

SWEET NOODLE KUGEL CUSTARD

½ lb. medium egg noodles
1 stick butter
8 oz. creamed cottage cheese
8 oz. cream cheese (softened)
8 oz. sour cream
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
2 cups milk
5 eggs
Cinnamon/sugar mixture

Preheat oven to 350. In a large saucepan cook and drain the noodles according to directions on package. Return noodles to the pan after they are drained and then mix the butter and cream cheese into the drained noodles. Mix well. Add the cottage cheese, sour cream, sugar, vanilla and milk to the noodles, mix well. In a separate bowl, beat the eggs. Add the beaten eggs and mix well. Pour the noodle mixture into a greased 3-quart casserole. Sprinkle the top of the kugel with cinnamon and sugar and bake for 1 hour. Serves 8.

VEGETABLE KUGEL

¼ cup pareve margarine or oil
3 onions, sliced
¼ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
2¼ cups grated raw potato
2¼ cups grated carrots
1½ cups grated tart apple
3 eggs, lightly beaten
¼ cup matzah meal
¼ tsp. grated lemon rind

Preheat oven to 325. In a skillet, melt half of the margarine. Saute onions, stirring and adding up to 2 tbsp. of water to prevent sticking, for approx. 5 minutes. Add thyme, salt and pepper. Reduce heat and cook, stirring often, for 15 minutes or until the onions are soft and golden. Let cool for 5 minutes. In bowl, combine the onion mixture, potatoes, carrot, apple, eggs, matzah meal and lemon rind. Mix well and then pat mixture into a greased 8-in.-sq. baking dish. Melt remaining margarine and drizzle over the top. Bake for about 1 hour or until golden around edges. (Can be covered and refrigerated up to 24 hours before baking.) Makes approx. 8 servings

YERUSHALAYIM KUGEL

7 cups water, boiling
1½ cups sugar
¾ cup margarine
1½-2 tsp. salt (depending on taste)
¼ tsp. pepper
1 lb. angel hair noodles
3 eggs, beaten

In a large pot, melt the sugar until it is liquid and a light golden brown. Do not overcook, and remove it from the heat immediately. Pour in water slowly, being careful not to let the steam burn you. Add margarine, salt and pepper. When margarine melts, add noodles. Bring noodles to boil and let them cook for 5 minutes. Cool for 20 minutes or longer. Slowly add eggs and mix well. (Make sure the mixture isn't too hot, or the eggs will be cooked instead of combined with the rest of the mixture.) After mixture is combined pour into a 9 x 13-in. greased pan. This can also be made in a deep round pan. Bake at 350 for 45 minutes. Serves 10 to 12.

POTATO KUGEL

6 medium potatoes
1 onion, grated
½ cup flour or potato flour
½ tsp. baking powder
1½ tsp. salt
¼ cup margarine
2 eggs, beaten
Pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Peel and grate the potatoes into a large bowl and add the beaten eggs. Mix well. In a separate bowl, sift together the flour, salt, baking powder and pepper. When the mixture is combined add it to the potato mixture. Add the grated onion. Melt margarine and gently stir it in. Pour the mixture into a well greased casserole. Bake for 1 hour or until crisp and brown on top. Makes 6 servings.

Who is the enemy of peace?

By BEN ARCHIBALD
Special to The CJN

Comment

At this writing, American President Bill Clinton has just announced the failure of the 15-day Camp David summit to yield a peace agreement ending the 100-year conflict between the Palestinians and Israel. Although the failure has delayed inevitable compromises on Jerusalem, borders and refugees, the approach taken by Prime Minister Ehud Barak was the responsible one.

Unlike the Oslo and Wye models, Barak sought to determine whether or not the Palestinians were genuinely interested in reaching an agreement with Israel. Sadly, the cries of the right are finally proving true, breaking the left's "Oslo-illusion" that Israel can be at peace with its neighbours as long as it continues to yield territory to the Palestinians.

Yielding territory and making concessions will only bear fruit when the party you are yielding to respects the agreement and abides by its principles.

Only a year ago in these pages, this author suggested that the glee world leaders took in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's demise was misplaced.

Netanyahu took an unpopular position, stating clearly that peace could not come without reciprocity or security for Israel. Barak built on this principle by making aggressive moves toward peace, sacrificing his coalition in order to determine once and for all if peace was attainable.

Peace on reasonable terms reflective of the common history of Israeli and Palestinian claims is not yet here. Another series of interim accords in which Israel continues to cede authority and control to the Palestinians without receiving anything in return will not change this basic fact.

Recognizing this, Barak pushed the Palestinians to the wall, stating that he and Israel were ready to risk national unity and much territory in order to make the hard decisions that are required of great leaders.

Many feel Barak went too far in his courtship of Arafat and a potential agreement. Leaving internal politics aside, Barak made a generous offer that would have proven a hard sell in a national referendum. Nonetheless, accustomed to the Israeli pattern of agreeing to interim accords and eventual concessions on all material points, Arafat balked at Barak's offer and chose to walk away from compromise and possibly into conflict.

Barak has displayed the courage of a great statesman, risking total failure in an attempt to determine what kind of partner Israel has in the current Palestinian leadership. After seven years of supposed bridge building and working side-by-side, Israel's partner is not yet ready.

Camp David's failure must not stop Israel from seeking peace. The lesson of Camp David is clear: concession upon concession will not make the Palestinians recognize or accept Israel's existence. What is needed is a fundamental change in perceptions and attitudes toward the Jewish state.

Until then, the Oslo model remains a poor and misguided one. Netanyahu was not the enemy of peace nor is Barak the enemy of the national camp. Israel must unite behind its prime minister in light of the sad reality that compromise does not always result in agreement.

The search for peace must continue, however, Israel must follow Barak's lead and only make agreements when they address all core issues to the conflict.

McGill grad wins journalism award

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Whether she's writing about an obscure 19th-century English poet or issues affecting world Jewry, Miriam Shaviv's high standards are evident.

The 1999 McGill graduate – who majored in English on a full scholarship and wrote her honours BA thesis on Jesuit bard Gerard Manley Hopkins – is the recipient of this year's JDC-Smolar Student Journalism Award for an article that appeared in the Aug. 16, 1999 issue of The Jerusalem Report.

The $1,000 (US) award is given by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee to the Jewish student whose published story best fosters understanding of world Jewry. It was established in 1980 to honour the late Boris Smolar, former editor-in-chief of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Shaviv's winner dealt with the efforts of Winnipeg's Jewish community to recruit Jewish immigrants from Argentina. The magazine – a glossy, Jerusalem-based, English-language weekly – sent Shaviv to Winnipeg from her Toronto home for two days last summer to research the article.

Three years ago, she served as a summer intern at the Jerusalem Report. "I learned an incredible amount," she said. "It was really a formative experience for me."

Although her duties in Israel included a number of routine tasks, it was through the editing process that she learned the most, she said. Once she successfully completed her first article, her work appeared in every issue for the rest of her three-month internship.

"I was very lucky to get to write a lot. It doesn't always happen," Shaviv, 23, said in her distinctive accent reflecting a childhood and adolescence during which she lived in three countries.

Miriam Shaviv

It's "relatively rare" for interns to continue writing for the publication once their internship is over, she added. Other pieces she's contributed to the Report include a profile of Toronto's Mayor Mel Lastman and a feature on declining numbers in the Montreal Jewish community.

The award-winner, entitled The Diaspora Raiders' Dilemma, was "one of the pieces I was most excited about writing. I found the subject fascinating," Shaviv said in an interview at the Ontario Association of Optometrists, where she works as communications co-ordinator.

The "dilemma" in the headline refers to concerns about the propriety of encouraging Jewish immigration to a Diaspora community instead of Israel.

"What's remarkable about the Winnipeg story is the sensitivity that the recruiters have shown," said Report editor David Horovitz in his column of the same issue.

As a first-time visitor to Winnipeg, Shaviv was impressed by the vibrancy of the Jewish community, whose population has dwindled from 20,000 to 14,000 over the past two decades.

The Winnipeg article represented "a fresh take on something I'm really interested in." It was only when she won the Smolar award, however, that Shaviv realized how much of her work has dealt with Israel-Diaspora relations.

From a personal standpoint, Shaviv is well qualified to write about the subject. A native of London, England, she made aliyah with her family at age 6, returned to England as a teenager, then finished high school in Sydney, Australia before moving to Canada.

She credits her parents – Paul, the headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and Judy – for teaching her and her two brothers to regard each of their moves as an adventure.

Shaviv, who was the first female editor of the biannual student journal Dateline: Middle East, has also contributed to New Voices and Afterword.

These days, she is learning about "the flip side of the media" as she works on press releases and public relations for the association. Her background has given her "a better feel for what might be an interesting story," and she finds she "quite" enjoys working on the other side as well.

Coast to Coast

Why public has disdain

Consider for a moment the following scenario. A young fellow approaches you with a proposition that he take your daughter out on a date. He promises to show her a good time and return her safely home after an innocuous evening of dinner and dancing. He then adds that he has no real interest in your daughter. Rather, he unabashedly acknowledges that he is using her to publicly demonstrate his suave manners and dancing skills in the hope of attracting a more attractive partner.

As you slammed the door in his face, no doubt you'd be thinking that this seemingly earnest fellow is pretty damned arrogant...and stupid!

If I were living in Wolfville, Nova Scotia, those would certainly be the thoughts that crossed my mind as I digested Joe Clark's announcement that he would be running in the upcoming byelection.

Here's a guy who has been leader of a party for more than two years, who has had just under a dozen opportunities to run for a seat in the House of Commons in various byelections during that time. Finally, he wakes up and realizes that he desperately must get into the House before the next election – which may be only three months away.

It should come as no surprise then, that on the same day he announced his bid for the riding of Kings-Hants the media reported a new survey that confirms growing public cynicism with politicians and their craft.

The Joe Clark gambit is representative of much that has contributed to this sense of public despair and disdain for the world of politics. By choosing to run in a forced by-election, Clark is guilty – at least in the eyes of a majority of jaded Canadians – of having displaced a highly regarded, much liked MP for the sake of advancing his political ambitions.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Clark has neither the intimate knowledge of the riding that Scott Brison (the man who represented the riding until last week) does, nor the interest in defending the interests of that riding in any serious, sustained way.

Even if the governing Liberals give Joe Clark a "bye" in this byelection, those cynical Canadians can be comforted by the NDP pledge to fiercely contest the election. Notwithstanding a Tory provincial government in Nova Scotia, we shouldn't discount an NDP upset...mostly reflecting how upset constituents are with politics in general.

First ever mini-ulpan opens in Vancouver

By MARLANE SMITH
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Been vowing to brush up on your Hebrew? The opportunity for immersion in an intensive ulpan Hebrew experience is closer than you may think.

"Come to Vancouver and learn with us," said Rahel Halabe, head teacher of Vancouver's Hebrew immersion program.

A former teacher from Israel, Halabe will facilitate and instruct the week-long course with another former Israeli teacher, Shoshana Hofman. Both Halabe and Hofman live and work in Vancouver as Hebrew language instructors. The course is the first of its kind in Vancouver.

"It has received quite a warm welcome so far," said program co-ordinator Lorne Mallin. "One big piece of evidence is the $1,000 grant from the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Vancouver."

Under Halabe's tutoring, Mallin has been taking intermediate Hebrew lessons since October. During these language studies, he recalled how fundamental his first ulpan experience was in crystallizing his Hebrew abilities: "It was a few years after my bar mitzvah, and in three months, I was conversational. Keep in mind, however, that was a 20-year-old mind."

Now 53, Mallin said he wanted something to kick-start his Hebrew again. "I didn't have the cash to fly all the way to Israel and I thought, well, why don't we do something here in Vancouver?"

The five-day program, which has been named a mini-ulpan will begin Aug. 14 and will be held from 9 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. at Or Shalom Synagogue.

The program is designed to enrich students' vocabulary, give them confidence in conversation, encourage them to read more in Hebrew and deepen their understanding of Hebrew grammar, Mallin said.

He also emphasized the social aspect of the rigorous program. Video night, song night, potluck dinners and a kabbalah and learning evening will keep students busy – and immersed in Hebrew – outside of the daytime schedule.

Interested students should have completed the Level Alef textbook or an equivalent, and have some level of conversational ability to qualify for and feel comfortable in the mini-ulpan. Described as Ulpan Level Beit, the course's students will have a choice between two levels within the group, the lower of which will accommodate students who have not yet reached an intermediate level.

"We've got 13 people registered so far," Mallin said, adding that the full enrolment is targeted at between 15 and 20 students.

Peretz School graduates hold reunion in Vancouver

By ESTER SCHWARTZ-KAGAN
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — They say you can't go home again, but the I.L. Peretz Folk School class of 1963 reunion made us feel as if we had.

Held recently in Vancouver, the reunion brought together 26 of the 41 graduates of the Peretz School in Winnipeg, some of whom had not seen each other in more than 35 years. People flew in from Winnipeg, Toronto, New York and San Francisco to reminisce, shmooze and laugh.

Attending the Peretz School was a unique experience. Although we learned some Hebrew, we spent most of the day immersed in Yiddish, the language spoken most frequently at home or by our bubbies and zaydes. To us it was "git Shabbos" not "Shabbat shalom."

Our parents had sent us to the school for various reasons. Some had escaped the horrors of the war, and having their children educated in Yiddish was important to them. Parents born in Winnipeg chose the school because of its socialist philosophy. The heimish environment forged a bond that brought us together 37 years later.

The hosts, four classmates who now live in Vancouver, planned a weekend of dinners, lunches and poetry readings. Loot bags were distributed and old pictures were viewed.

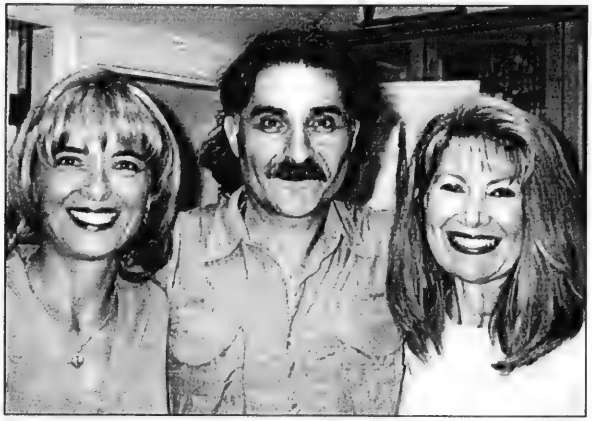
Over the three days we talked, laughed and told stories about our time as Peretz School students. We commented on how good we all looked – gray hair, no hair and extra pounds notwithstanding.

And the weather was typically West Coast – rain, rain and more rain – but no one cared.

On Friday night at Faigie Raber's home, we ate corned beef that came from a transplanted Winnipeg butcher shop, shared stories about our careers, children and spouses, nodded sympathetically about the divorces, illnesses and deaths, and took dozens of pictures.

Reesa Margolis treated us to a Saturday evening of delicacies we had enjoyed as children, which she had brought back from a recent trip to Winnipeg.

It was like being home again as we spoke Yiddish and sang Yiddish songs.



Seen are (from left) Ester Schwartz-Kagan, Bayter and Ethel Levine-Kofsky. The three were part of a group of 26 graduates of Winnipeg's Peretz School, class of 1963, who attended a reunion held in Vancouver.

Nazi collaborator proclaims his innocence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former police officer in an auxiliary unit linked closely with the German SS is proclaiming his innocence – more than one year after a Federal Court judge found he lied to enter Canada.

Serge Kisluk, 77, told the St. Catharines Standard he is an innocent man.

"I don't feel guilty about anything they say I did. I feel injustice," Kisluk told The Standard.

Kisluk claimed the evidence against him was part of a KGB plot.

Despite Kisluk's protestations – and his testimony during his Federal Court citizenship hearing – Judge Allan Lufty found Kisluk lied to immigration authorities about his wartime collaboration with the Nazis and that his testimony was not credible.

The judge found Kisluk assisted the Germans as a railway guard and later as an auxiliary policeman in the Turlysk region of Ukraine, between 1941 and 1943. Judge Lufty also found that Kisluk forcibly escorted a Jewish woman to her execution and was present when she was shot.

Lufty dismissed Kisluk's suggestion that the KGB fabricated evidence against him and he found that, "simply put, I do not believe [Kisluk's] testimony on any contentious issue."

The Standard described Kisluk and his wife Todosia as living in fear and uncertainty. The paper reported Kisluk's legal difficulties "have taken a toll on the elderly man who suffers from diabetes and problems."

His wife suffers from breast cancer and says she may not be able to obtain the expensive medication needed to combat the disease if she accompanies Kisluk to Ukraine – in the event he is deported to his former homeland.

Responding to a question about whether it is cruel to deport Kisluk at this stage in his life, Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber said it is not unfair to deport him. What is unfair, Farber told The Standard, is for Kisluk to have lived in Canada for 50 years.

Daughters of Eve do her proud

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Some people think that only men are important in the Torah and in Jewish history. They think that almost the only job women had was to carry the unleavened bread on their heads during the exodus from Egypt.

Lillian Hammer Ross sets the record straight in her new book, Daughters of Eve; strong women of the Bible (Barefoot Press, 2000), with illustrations by Kyra Teis.

Women in the Bible were brave and showed great trust in God, Ross says. They were willing to speak their minds, or to act against the will of their husbands or fathers to do what was right.

Of course, the women she writes about were very special – prophets, queens, community leaders. Still what a great example for us to follow!

Ross makes the women – Miriam, Zipporah, the daughters of Zelophehad, Ruth, Abigail, Huldah, Judith and Esther – very real, people with dreams, fears and hopes.

Miriam, for instance, misses her brother Moses when he goes to live in Pharaoh's palace, and she is cheered up by her mother's gift of a tambourine.

Zipporah wants a husband who is strong, intelligent and kind.

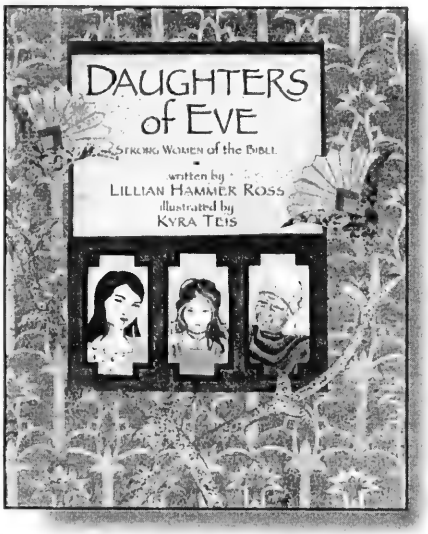
Esther muses while waiting for Achashverosh to choose a bride: "A woman is not a water-jug to be bought at the market."

These women are by no means wimps. Judith is quite willing to risk her life to save her town from the Babylonians, and the daughters of Zelophehad don't hesitate to fight for their claim to their father's estate.

As you can see from this review, Ross does not stick to the usual accounts in the Bible – she makes up stories about these women to make them more interesting and to highlight different parts of their personalities.

Before each story, there is a page of historical and biblical background about the person's times.

Kyra Teis' illustrations are rich with shades of rust and purple.



It is interesting that in a book called Daughters of Eve, she doesn't talk at all about Eve herself. And I would have liked to see what she might have written about Deborah, who was not only a prophet, but was also a judge, at a time when it was almost unheard of for women to hold that position.

Dealing with Jerusalem as a symbol and as a city

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Jews and Arabs cross paths as they go about their daily business in Jerusalem. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Jerusalem may be a city infused with historical and religious significance to three of the world's great faiths, but it is also a city with ordinary people who live ordinary lives.

As the fate of Jerusalem was brought to the negotiating table in Camp David, pundits tried to determine whether compromise could supersede the passions that have prevented Israelis and Palestinians from discussing the city until now, and lead to a historic peace accord.

But there was little talk about things like garbage collection or social security, issues that would have been affected by any agreement to change the status of parts of the city.

Apparently, passions over the city were too strong for the Camp David negotiators and were primarily the reasons for the summit's end.

If there ever is any decision on Jerusalem, it would need to take into account both the heavenly aura of a city charged with emotion and faith, as well as the earthly details of how municipal bureaucracy would function in a shared metropolis.

The issues are further complicated by difficult geography, with Arab and Jewish neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem situated side by side.

During the negotiations, it was unclear what type of formula for sharing the city – if any – the leaders were discussing.

What is clear is that during the 33 years since Israel captured eastern Jerusalem in the Six Day War, the unification of the two extremely different sides of the city has created a dynamic that will be hard to reverse.

Many Palestinians work in Jewish parts of Jerusalem and are an integral part of the city's economic pulse. They may work primarily in menial jobs, but at least they have jobs, in contrast to the many Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip who are unemployed.

Indeed, the economic realities of the city, combined with the mutual need for free access to holy sites, are among the reasons why Israeli and Palestinian leaders knew from the start that any change in the city's status could not include a physical division of Jerusalem. Neither side wants new masses of unemployed Palestinians or a checkpoint in the centre of the city.

Still, the lives of Palestinians in eastern Jerusalem would likely change significantly if an accord is signed that would place control of their affairs under the Palestinian Authority – and not necessarily for the better.

An increasing number of Palestinians are putting patriotism aside and speaking out openly about their fears of living under Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's regime, with its well-documented corruption and stagnant economic policy.

Khader Ali, a 50-year-old unemployed resident of the Shuafat refugee camp, which could be transferred to the Palestinians, is not looking forward to Palestinian rule as he watches what he calls "corruption or nepotism" just down the road.

"The truth is we don't want either side, the status quo is good," he said. Under that status quo, Ali, who has 12 children, enjoys a standard Israeli per-child social security stipend that totals more than $1,200 a month – more than the typical salary of a Palestinian police officer and a decent sum even for blue-collar Israeli workers.

A few years ago, he worked on the printing press at The Jerusalem Post. When he lost his job, he received $500 a month in unemployment benefits for several months.

"Arafat won't pay me unemployment benefits or social security," he said. "We cannot say it openly but we prefer Israel."

For Israelis, it is unclear what the practical ramifications of any agreements on Jerusalem would be. Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, has spoken out repeatedly against any compromise in Jerusalem, mostly on historical and religious grounds.

In a recent op-ed piece in Yediot Achronot, Israel's largest mass circulation newspaper, Olmert alluded to the potential problems of sharing sovereignty with the Palestinians.

"The Israeli government is constantly talking about separation, but in practice this produces an idea that has no ground in reality," wrote Olmert.

Yet when asked by JTA for more detail on the possible practical ramifications of a compromise in the city, and how it could affect the lives of Jewish residents, a spokesperson for the mayor said, "the question is irrelevant since the mayor is against any division of Jerusalem." In any case, said the official, Olmert could not respond in more detail until an accord was announced.

However, the increasing roster of prominent figures now speaking out in favour of a compromise on Jerusalem includes people who say Israelis would feel absolutely no change in their lives if some form of sovereignty is granted to the Palestinians in eastern Jerusalem.

"Practically speaking, there is no problem for Palestinians to officially take over their affairs in Jerusalem," said Arieh Amit, a businessperson who served as Jerusalem police chief between 1994 and 1996 and who has published papers supporting a compromise.

"There will be no change whatsoever for Israelis, since they do not go to those places that would be handed over to the Palestinians."

Amit argues that the city is already divided in reality because during the past few years the Palestinian Authority has quietly started providing civil services and even begun to take control of security affairs in Arab neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem.

He even predicts improvements in security for Israelis if the city is divided, due to increased co-operation between Israeli and Palestinian forces, and expects Palestinians to continue to work freely with Jews.

Peace talks reach new level of seriousness

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The collapse of the Camp David summit was, as Prime Minister Ehud Barak acknowledged wearily, a "major blow" as well as a missed opportunity along the rocky road toward peace.

Mideast Analysis

After two weeks of intensive negotiations presided over by President Bill Clinton, he and Yasser Arafat left Maryland dejectedly, not having signed an accord that could have heralded an end to Israel's protracted, acrimonious conflict with the Palestinians. No one was particularly surprised that the ultimate deal breakers were the status of Jerusalem and the fate of the Palestinian refugees.

Yet the summit was not an unmitigated failure, since it raised the excruciatingly difficult talks to a new level of seriousness and set the stage for further meetings.

For the first time since they entered into face-to-face negotiations at the Madrid conference in 1991, two years before the startling Oslo breakthrough, Israel and the Palestinians got down to the unfinished business of addressing the make-or-break issues that fester at the heart of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Barak, breaking long-cherished taboos, much to the outrage of his right-wing political opponents at home, offered the Palestinians unprecedented concessions as part of a rigorous security package and an unambiguous Palestinian declaration ending all claims against Israel. As Clinton suggested in a post-Camp David assessment, the offer was a testament to Barak's courage, purpose and flexibility.

Although the details remain shrouded in fog, Barak, by all accounts, was prepared to grant the Palestinians a mosaic of sovereignty and administrative control of some Arab neighbourhoods and holy places in eastern Jerusalem in exchange for annexing several settlements near the city. Arafat conceded the principle of Israeli sovereignty over western Jerusalem, the Jewish quarter and the Western Wall, but demanded sovereignty over the rest of East Jerusalem.

As for the Palestinian refugee issue, Barak agreed to admit about 100,000 refugees within a phased-in family reunification and compensation plan. But here, too, Arafat balked.

In an unmistakable signal of his readiness to acquiesce to an independent, demilitarized and territorially contiguous Palestinian state, Barak was prepared to relinquish the whole of the Gaza Strip and upwards of 95 percent of the West Bank, including the Jordan Valley. In exchange for retaining about five percent of the West Bank, with its cluster of three settlement blocs encompassing 80 percent of Jewish settlers, he was willing to give up a stretch of uninhabited Israeli land adjacent to Gaza.

With the failure of the summit, Barak declared that all understandings reached at Camp David were "null and void." Under its ground rules, there would be no agreement unless all issues were resolved. But one can safely assume that the historic compromises hammered out in Maryland will be the basis of new talks, which both sides clearly desire. Yet, like the Syrians, the Palestinians will insist that a fresh round of negotiations should begin at the point they left off.

Upon his return to Israel, Barak spoke of the "painful, difficult and heart-wrenching price" Israel will have to pay for peace. The question now, therefore, is whether Barak can proceed on this path and rebuild his shattered coalition, torn asunder by his conciliatory policies and his decision to go to Camp David.

During the next few weeks, he will try to cobble together a government capable of solving the Palestinian problem before Arafat declares unilateral statehood on Sept. 13, an event that could set off violence. Yet Barak's enemies, spearheaded by the Likud and the National Religious Party, are clamouring for new elections.

Arafat, having resisted Israeli and American pressure to settle for a principled compromise, is stronger today than he was prior to Camp David, and thus, ironically, in a better position to reach a deal with Israel. If Barak can keep his foes at bay, he and Arafat may yet sign a peace treaty.

Three held for synagogue arson

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Police here arrested three men last week on suspicion of being involved in the arson attack on the Ya'ar Ramot Synagogue last month.

The three are newly religious residents of the Ramot neighbourhood, aged 29 to 30, and are known to police.

Police sources say one suspect, who expressed no regrets, admitted torching the synagogue and implicated the other two, who deny any involvement in the arson.

The suspect said he and his accomplices did not like having the synagogue in their neighbourhood and decided to set it on fire. Jerusalem Magistrate's Court remanded two of the suspects in custody for four days and the third for three days.

Witnesses reported seeing a number of haredim running away from the site.

PA supports suggestion for Arab summit on Jerusalem

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority supports the idea of holding an Arab summit meeting as soon as possible to create a united front against Israel on the Jerusalem question, an adviser to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat said Sunday.

Speaking in Jiddah, Saudi Arabia, where Arafat held talks with Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah, Nabil Abu Rowadena said the PA leader, who flew to Saudi Arabia on Saturday from Paris, had discussed the Jerusalem issue with Saudi leaders.

Arafat was also scheduled to visit Morocco, Tunisia and Jordan on his current tour in which he is briefing the Arab leaders on the outcome of the Camp David talks and trying to get support for an Arab summit meeting on the disputed city.

The Palestinians were infuriated by President Bill Clinton's statement in an Israel Television interview Friday night that a Palestinian declaration of unilateral statehood would "inevitably [lead to] consequences."

In response, Arafat told reporters in Paris on Saturday, after his meeting with President Jacques Chirac: "The date [for proclaiming statehood] should normally fall in September, in a few weeks. When the right time comes, we will consider what to do."

He added that the Palestinians "will take the advice of our friends into consideration."

Prince Abdullah was quoted by a Palestinian official as saying that "Jerusalem is the basis for any peace settlement in the Middle East. Without full Arab control over Jerusalem there will not be peace in the Middle East."

PM willing to defer issue of capital

In the second option, the resolution of the status of east Jerusalem neighbourhoods would be deferred for some time.

Barak told the cabinet Sunday that the Israeli contingent was not enthusiastic about either of these options, but eventually told the Americans that Israel would be willing to consider the proposal, should Arafat also show interest.

Barak told Clinton that any agreed-upon deferral concerning a contentious issue must not preclude reaching a comprehensive agreement. Under a full Israeli-Palestinian agreement, the sides would declare that the dispute between them is concluded, and any outstanding issues (such as Jerusalem) would be resolved at a later date, in peaceful talks between two states.

Barak also asked that a time frame for discussing the postponed issues be established, along with a mechanism for facilitating talks.

The Palestinians, however, rejected both U.S. Jerusalem-deferral options. They argued that procrastination about Jerusalem could lead to a situation akin to the fate of Kashmir, whose status was supposed to be resolved a short time after a ceasefire was enforced between India and Pakistan in 1949, only to have its fate disputed until the present day.

Barak said that although he's leaving most negotiation options open, he would oppose the forging of another interim agreement, "because it would be dangerous to Israel." He argued against an interim proposal supported by Minister Haim Ramon, who believes that attaining a full agreement with the Palestinians now is a near impossibility, because of the deep-seated disputes concerning sovereignty in Jerusalem.

Ramon said straightening out sovereignty issues in Jerusalem will require years of work and negotiation, and therefore an interim agreement is the most feasible option.

Barak replied he has concluded that Israel has a supreme interest in solving its dispute with the Palestinians comprehensively, if possible.

Yet, he clarified, "before the summit and during it, we were willing to discuss the American proposal for two scenarios of deferring the discussion of Jerusalem, but the Palestinians refused to talk about them."

Student designs for Jerusalem

By ESTHER HECHT
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — A city as complex as Israel's capital, where any architectural change can create an international stir, needs fresh, radical ideas to help shape its future.

That was the inspiration for Beyond the Walls, a competition focused on Jerusalem for local architecture students.

The winner, announced on June 14, was Amal Ubied Zoabi, 26, a third-year student at Jerusalem's Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design.

Her project, titled The Light Beyond the Walls, is a pedestrian path linking the Ascension Church, the Jewish cemetery on the Mount of Olives, and the Dome of the Rock.

"Most important for me was the feelings I wanted this space to provide," said Zoabi, a Muslim from Nazareth. "The path enables people to discover the light of Jerusalem."

On March 21, the first day of spring, the sun's rays pass from the church marking the place where Jesus ascended to heaven, then through the cemetery, and to the dome over the rock from where Mohammed made his ascent to heaven, she said.

Zoabi was inspired by the biblical account of the resurrection of the dead and a similar account in the Koran. But "my point of view is not religious," she said. Instead, she was interested in joining people "through the myths."

The students' brief was "to propose a plan that expresses the myth and code of the city, serves its inhabitants and visitors, and helps define Jerusalem's space into the future." Entrants could choose one of three sites: the downtown district centring on Independence Park; the hillside from the Mount Scopus-Mount of Olives ridge to the Rockefeller Museum; or the space from the Cinematheque to the train station.

The competition was open to students at schools throughout Israel, the administered territories and the Palestinian Authority. Bir Zeit University, near Ramallah, declined to participate.

The contest was an adjunct to the fifth Jerusalem Seminar in Architecture, a biennial forum sponsored by Yad Hanadiv – The Rothschild Foundation, in which top architects from around the world present their work to more than 2,000 architects and students. The competition and the master class devoted to it were the first attempt of the seminars to grapple with the subject of Jerusalem.

Nazareth-born Amal Ubied Zoabi shows her prize-winning design linking Christian, Muslim and Jewish sites in Jerusalem.

It has been a strange omission. "Jerusalem is a paradigm of complexity," said Daniel Libeskind from Germany, designer of the well-known Jewish Museum in Berlin and chair of the seminar and the competition. "The planning debate about Jerusalem is relevant to the world."

In the final round, the judges chose six projects, created by 13 students from among the 52 entries. Although there was only one woman architect among those who presented their work at the seminar, 10 of the 13 finalists in the competition were women – reflecting the fact that about half the architecture students in Israel are women.

Zoabi, whose prize was a $4,000 travel grant to further her education, was the only finalist who worked alone. The judges had very idiosyncratic ways of approaching the works.

Architecture historian and theoretician Charles Jencks from England, said he had read all the students' descriptive texts carefully and that he "liked the metaphor" of Zoabi's project.

Libeskind said he had ignored the manifestos and explanations and had looked only at the designs. "Architecture is about making," he explained. But he added: "We looked for radical projects that challenge what is a wall. We didn't look for answers [but rather for projects that are] rooted in deeper spiritual longing."

And indeed, that deeper longing was expressed in abundance, though in very different ways. One project in the final round, by Tal Lau, Michal Levoria and Dana Regev of Haifa's Technion, put a positive spin on the capital's fractured nature, portraying "variance as an achievement, not a disease."

Their scheme involved a theatre curtain placed in the Arab neighbourhood of Silwan, "as a metaphoric screen through and by [which] we are viewed on our everyday voyages." It would replace what they termed "the monologue of knowing the truth."

Many of the schemes were conceptualized horizontally. Ronen Boneh and Daphna Daily, of Haifa's Wizo college, viewed the core of Jerusalem as a ring and conceived of the little-known Third Wall (built by Agrippas in the Second Temple period) as part of the ring, changing it "from a wall of detachment and separation to a connecting element" and creating new connections in the neighbourhoods around it.

Other projects invoked verticality. One scheme used the roofs of buildings in the downtown area as additional public space, taking its cue from the idea of walking on the Old City walls. Another project included a raised, "floating" structure with views to the Old City, to be used for educational purposes, snaking over an open area that could become a marketplace.

Nevertheless, none of the entrants dealt with the much-debated issue of whether to build high in Jerusalem, and how to control urban sprawl, Jencks said. Nor, he added, had the entrants dealt with the issue of stone (a city ordinance dating back to the British Mandate requires stone facings on all Jerusalem buildings), which once had helped form the city's identity but now is a "straitjacket," so that "you have to build concrete buildings out of stone, wooden buildings out of stone."

Ken Yeang from Malaysia, known for his concept of the "green skyscraper," wondered why the students had not allowed for "the play of landscape" in their schemes.

Libeskind added a general criticism of the works: Many of the entrants did not relate to how their schemes could be implemented. One of the most interesting entries, which proposed looking at Jerusalem as a game and playing with the rules of planning, was not chosen precisely because it remained in the abstract.

Libeskind's criticism was certainly legitimate, though the judges' discussions of the works were often far from "down to earth" and tended to wander into the stratosphere of theology, metaphysics and points beyond. But the students' texts – all in English -- were interesting for the combination of optimism and realism they expressed. One stated: "We believe architecture cannot create social or political situations. Architecture provides chances for such situations we did not know exist."

The truest optimist, however, was David Guggenheim from Israel, the competition's co-ordinator, who said, "We thought this kind of competition would open the discussion [on Jerusalem]. I hope people from the municipality come and see."

The seminar itself, titled Reinventing Space: Beyond the Boundaries of the 20th Century, included a dazzling display of some of the most publicized and controversial works throughout the world of the last decade, as well as verbal pyrotechnics from Libeskind, Jencks, Wolf Prix from Austria, design engineer Cecil Balmond from England, and Bernard Tschumi, dean of the Columbia University school of architecture, planning and preservation.

Toronto actress relishes her role in summer blockbuster

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Rhona Shekter

TORONTO — Blink long enough and you might miss it, but local actress Rhona Shekter has a role in one of the biggest blockbusters of the summer.

If you've seen X-Men you might remember a scene at the beginning where the villain, Magneto, is still a little boy in wartime Poland and is being separated from his mother by Nazi guards at a concentration camp.

Magneto's mother, played by Shekter, appeals to the guards to be reunited with her son, but to no avail. This three-minute scene is important because it explains the adult Magneto's villainous motives.

It took Shekter three days to film those three minutes. "Three very long days," she says. "We were on the set from daybreak to sunset."

The scene is set in a Polish concentration camp (actually the downtown Lakeshore area in Toronto, between two abandoned warehouses.) It was very wet (the scene was set in rain for dramatic effect), and muddy.

"It was a tough scene. I was walking in mud and we were rained on the whole time. They shot for hours and we got wetter and wetter and my clothes became very heavy and weighted down."

For continuity's sake, after she took off the clothes, they were kept wet for the next day's filming.

"It was very exhausting and I could even remotely imagine what it's like– a tiny taste of what it was like –to be in a concentration camp – except, of course, I had a nice meal to eat."

During shooting she got to meet veteran actor Ian McKellen who plays the adult Magneto. "But, I was too tired and cold to enjoy meeting him," she said.

Actor Patrick Stewart was also on the set but remained hidden the whole time she was there.

Shekter's dialogue in the movie was in Polish. Although she can speak many dialects, she found Polish very tough and they brought in a voice coach to help her.

"Polish is so different than anything else, I was afraid I couldn't do it. I was in a panic and the voice coach helped me through it syllable by syllable."

As it turned out, the dialogue wasn't used in the film. But Shekter isn't complaining. She's just glad she's in the movie.

Many times certain roles are left on the cutting room floor (think Kevin Costner in The Big Chill). Shekter had a role in Paul Mazursky's Enemies: A Love Story a few years ago, but after editing, all that was left of her role was the back of her head.

"There was a glimpse of my head – that was it – and I was on the set for a week."

But she needn't have worried this time. Although the nine-minute scene was edited down, "not only did I make the film, I was high up in the credits. Bryan Singer [the director] did not have to put me so close to the top."

That's not the first time it happened. In the aforementioned Enemies, even though she (or the back of her head) was only in it for a second, she got billed right after the two main actors.

"I play 'Rabbi's Wife,'" she says of her role in Enemies. "There are actually two rabbi's wives in the movie, an older one and I was the young chassidic wife."

She said because she got such high billing, people assumed she played the older wife, who had a bigger role. "Even my boyfriend at the time thought I was the other wife."

When she was in Hollywood handing in a project to an agent, he looked at her name and said, "You're the Rhona Shekter."

"He was one of those guys who memorize every credit in a film."

Shekter has been performing as long as she remembers, as a singer, and in theatre, commercials and films. She's had roles on TV in Traders, Street Legal, Due South and other shows. She's currently wrapped up a role in Steal This Movie, a major film based on the role of '60s counter-culture guru Abbie Hoffman, and will be in a TV-movie, When Andrew Came Home.

"Performing has always been in my blood," she said. "A performer is always performing. You don't wake up one morning and say you're going to do it."

She said being a performer is a very tough and competitive business and she doesn't take too kindly to people who see her three minutes and say, "Is that all?"

"That's the thing that's hard. I'm a working performer. I've sustained in this industry, as opposed to being an unemployed performer (of which there are many)." she said.

"One commercial I did for Maxwell House had 85 talented people audition for the one role. I have to take my hat off to anybody – a singer who can get a CD out or an actor who gets even one second on film. It's not an easy business."

Shekter sees her role as a performer evolving. She sang in concert series with conductor Boris Brott; she's acted in theatre, done commercials, TV shows, films and movies. She's even done voices for cartoons and you can hear her as the Spanish pink flamingo puppet Bonita Flamingo on the kids' show Noddy.

As part of her showbiz evolution, she's also formed her own production company and is pitching ideas to networks.

"If you're not auditioning, you're working or creating. I don't sit around waiting for my phone to ring."

Canadian singer rocks Israel

By VIVA PRESS

TEL AVIV — Canadian pop phenomenon Alanis Morissette recently rocked her way through Israel.

Morissette, whose album Jagged Little Pill sold more than 35 million copies worldwide, came to Israel as part of her Summer 2000 tour.

She played two shows in Israel — in Caesarea on July 19 for a sold-out crowd of 4,500, and in Rishon Lezion on July 20, where she drew 10,000 fans.

Morissette's concerts in the Middle East brought her 10-country tour to a close. She opened her tour in Beirut on July 5, and made her way through Italy, France, Germany, India, Portugal and Croatia. Her last concert on this tour was July 22 in Istanbul.

"My intention in coming on this tour was to go to countries I've been wanting to go to for a long time and to share music," she told a press conference in Tel Aviv. "I've always believed that music was my favourite form of communicating."

Touring "reinforces my belief that we are interconnected on a soul level, and I have found no better or more tangible an example of this than visiting and playing in these cities in person," she said.

Despite the steep NIS 199 ticket price ($72 Cdn), Israeli fans packed the amphitheatres to hear Morissette play live.

In 1995, Morissette, then 21, was propelled into the spotlight with Jagged Little Pill. But she was no one-disc wonder – her follow-up album, Supposed Former Infatuation Junkie, has gone triple platinum.

Before completing her second album, Morissette took time off and travelled with her mom and friend through India. She said she returned a much happier person.

"You don't have to suffer to create, to learn, to evolve," she told VH1's Behind the Music. "I've learned I can evolve faster if I don't suffer, if I just be."

Though she has said she prefers to sing about "sharing her peace, not her pain," the audience here clearly wanted to hear her "angry woman" hits from Jagged Little Pill.

She opened with her India-inspired songs from Supposed Former Infatuation Junkie and received a pleasant welcome. But once she launched into hits from Jagged Little Pill, the reception was noticeably louder.

Most of her set revolved around Jagged Little Pill songs, though she interspersed hits such as Baba and Thank U from the 1998 Supposed Former Infatuation Junkie.

She dismissed any notion of identifying herself as a Canadian, at her press conference before the shows – "I just think of myself as very human, I don't even think about what country I'm from or who my parents are. I just think of myself as one other individual in this wild pot of craziness."

But she was very Canadian in concert. She has a reputation for being overly polite, and she was in "Canadian" form when she thanked the audience after each song and when she told the crowd that they were "awesome" and that they "rocked" (two very Canadian phrases).

At the same time as she was entertaining music fans, Morissette was also being seen by moviegoers at the 17th annual Jerusalem Film Festival, in Kevin Smith's controversial movie, Dogma.

In the film, Morissette played the part of God. "I feel like we're all God, that we're manifesting God all the time. So I was just one little piece of God," she said.

But Morissette said she prefers music to acting. "There's nothing that can compare to the process of writing a song, it's definitely the most fulfilling part."

Morissette is now back in California where she lives, working on a new album.

Author believes book was in the cards

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — It was an uncanny brush with fate that set the stage for writing The Channel, says author Steven Ehrlich.

In the summer of 1997, Ehrlich was a lawyer at the now defunct EMI label, The Enclave. At that time, Ehrlich recalls meeting a friend in his New York office and being startled by her prediction of his future endeavours.

"I see all these good things happening to you if you write," Colette Baron-Reid told Ehrlich, the not so proud author of countless half-started, incomplete novels.

Just days after Baron-Reid's peek at the future, Ehrlich was given a book called The Artist's Way, a 12 step self-help book purported to help develop creativity.

Then, The Enclave shut down and with a year left in his contract, Ehrlich had a year's salary remaining, money he now refers to as a writing advance.

Together, Ehrlich insists, circumstances proved that the "planets aligned for me."

He was off and running, dedicating days and nights to the composition of The Channel, a book quite fittingly about clairvoyance, past-life regression and the quest for love.

The main character, Adam Fischer, is a middle-aged Jewish man living in New York, emotionally stoic since the time of his wife's death.

Passing through various points in history, such as the Battle of Gettysburg and the heart of the hippy movement, as well as the near future, Fischer is a cynic, unfazed by the sex and love of the '60s and skeptical of his friend Lucia's clairvoyant perceptions.

Like many first-time authors, Ehrlich admits there are shades of his own persona in Fischer's character.

"I was a card-carrying hippie and I was also a cynical one," the soft-spoken 49-year-old says. "I looked around and saw what I thought was…people having a good time under the guise of peace, love and stop the war.

"When people ask me 'Is Adam Fischer you?'" Ehrlich notes, "I say, 'No Adam Fischer isn't me, however, if we met we would have a lot in common.'"

As an earthquake ravages New York and Fischer finds himself in the midst of chaos, positive memories of his childhood provide some solace.

That family theme pops up throughout the book and reflects the "loving parents" Ehrlich grew up with in Toronto.

His father, Murray, was active in B'nai Brith and his mother, Edythe, was involved in the Jewish community as a member of Hadassah.

But Erhlich has not followed in his parents' footsteps. Although he is proud of his Jewish heritage, he is intrigued by Eastern religious concepts, particularly reincarnation and clairvoyance.

"I just know in my gut that there are other dimensional realities," he says. "I…[have] an intuitive sense that the world and our place in it are far more mysterious than our institutions and recorded history would have us believe."

About 2,000 copies of The Channel were printed in Canada and the United Sates and Ehrlich is hopeful the book will be a success.

"I want people to be compelled by the story," he says. "I want them to not be able to put it down. And [maybe] I [will] challenge the way they think along the way."

Erhlich is a little more cynical about the likelihood of his screenplay, It Ain't Easy – a tongue in cheek look at the record industry – hitting the big screen. "Screenplays are… well, you might as well buy a lottery ticket."

Busy publicizing the book and the screenplay, Ehrlich also juggles his duties as in-house counsel for EMI music. He and his wife, Trish, live in Mississauga and have two sons, Dylan and Shane.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II

Winnipeg writer-historian Allan Levine has the amphibious quality of being fully at home in both fiction and non-fiction. His books include the award-winning non-fiction title Fugitives of the Forest, about the partisan struggle during the Holocaust era, and The Blood Libel, a novel set in Winnipeg's rough-and-tumble North End that features the hard-boiled Jewish detective Sam Klein.

Earlier this year, The Blood Libel won a Best Historical Fiction award from the Manitoba Historical Society. It was also short-listed for the Chapters/Books in Canada First Novel award and the Arthur Ellis First Mystery Novel award.

Levine has completed a new Sam Klein mystery, which his publisher, Great Plains, is set to bring out in the fall. In Sins of the Suffragette, Klein investigates a murder in Winnipeg in 1914, in the course of which he encounters the historic personage of Nellie McClung and other women's rights activists. Like its predecessor, the book explores the uneasy tension between street life and post-Victorian morality.

"The new book doesn't have quite the Jewish theme that The Blood Libel does," Levine says, "but there are still many issues about Jewish life in Canada that arise." Part of the action, incidentally, is set in New York and involves Jewish characters on the Lower East Side.

One hopes the appearance of The Sins of the Suffragette so soon after the success of The Blood Libel will help Levine to develop a loyal following.

The Bible and Literature: Unnamed characters, such as Lot's wife, Jephthah's daughter, Pharaoh's baker and the medium of Endor, abound in the Bible. But why dispense with a name?

Adele Reinhartz, currently on sabbatical from her position as professor in the department of religious studies at McMaster University, has studied the question in depth. Her book Why Ask My Name?: Anonymity and Identity in Biblical Narrative, was published recently by the Oxford University Press.

Shortly after becoming interested in the Bible's anonymous characters, Reinhartz says, she began discovering them almost wherever she looked in the text – "among the ostracized lepers at the city gates, among the widowed and poor, in the households of Israel's founding families, in the courts and armies of the monarchs, and in the heavens themselves."

Her expectation of finding only a small number of unnamed characters was contradicted by her discovery of more than a hundred unnamed individuals, and many others in groups. And they were not preponderantly women, as she at first had supposed.

"I found abundant men, children and angels, as well as a talking animal or two," she says. "Whereas I had associated anonymity with indistinctness, impersonality, and distance, I was soon absorbed with these characters, whose personalities and stories became vital, vibrant, and vivid to me."

Written in highly accessible, non-technical language, Why Ask My Name? is an intriguing study, highly deserving of the Jewish Book Award bestowed upon it two months ago.

War and Remembrance: Rose Carolyn Johnson was born in Poland on Sept. 3, 1939, the momentous week that saw the beginning of World War II, and as a young child, she and her family were swept up in the horrors of that period. Her father joined the underground freedom fighters; her uncle was conscripted into the Polish army; the Germans wreaked havoc on her village; and she and other family members experienced the hell of a railway car bound for Auschwitz.

A gentile survivor who witnessed many Nazi atrocities, Johnson came to Canada after the war and settled in Alberta. She has written Next Stop – Germany, a 93-page historical narrative of her family's wartime experiences. The book is self-published. For further information, contact the author at P.O. Polish immigrant's memoirs chronicle Jewish left

Arts Editor

Canada's Jewish immigrants of the early 20th century were among the vanguard of the Canadian left. From organizing labour unions to having leading roles in the Canadian Communist party, Canadian Jews devoted much of their time and labour to their cause – only to see it come crashing down at the start of the Cold War.

Morris Biderman, an immigrant from Poland, was active in the Jewish labour movement's cultural groups early on and joined the Communist party. Now 93, Biderman – head of the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO) for 20 years – has just completed his memoirs, A Life on the Jewish Left (Onward Press).

The book is part autobiography, part history of the left-wing movement in Canada, specifically of UJPO.

Biderman was born near Kielce in Poland and immigrated to Canada in 1920.

He describes the early labour movements, including the Workers Unity League, the Fraternal Jewish Order and the Communist party. At the time, the Communists, with their leadership in the Profintern in Moscow, had a stranglehold on organized unions in Canada.

The book's strength is its chronicle of UJPO from its formation as the Labour League (a Communist-led splinter group from the Workmen's Circle) to its bitter quarrel with the Communists in the 1950s.

After its split with the Workmen's Circle, the Labour League continued its program of political action, trade union involvement, culture, education and fraternization. "The only difference was their support of the Soviet Union and the American and Canadian Communist movements," Biderman writes.

Biderman joined the Labour League in 1937 when he was asked to manage Der Kampf, the Communist Yiddish weekly. As the newspaper and the league were so closely connected, "I could not have held the position at the paper without belonging to the organization," he writes.

Biderman became president of the Labour League in 1942. Although not a Communist organization, it was Communist-led and a de facto arm of the Communists in Canada.

When the league, which began in Toronto, spread nationally, it changed its name to the United Jewish Peoples Order. Besides continuing its Communist-led political activity, it became involved in Jewish cultural programs like the Jewish Folk Choir and Camp Naivelt.

Biderman describes in detail the struggle UJPO had after World War II. As communism, once an ally in the struggle against fascism, began to lose mainstream support, UJPO felt itself ostracized by the Jewish community. In 1951, the Canadian Jewish Congress expelled UJPO.

The Order's biggest challenge started in 1948 with the formation of Israel. At first the U.S.S.R. favoured this new nation, but shortly thereafter did an abrupt about face and became staunchly anti-Israel.

News of Soviet anti-Semitism began to filter out of the U.S.S.R. At the beginning, Jewish Communists refused to believe the news. First came Solomon Michaels' (the head of Russia's Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee) fatal "accident." Then the Moscow Jewish Theatre was closed, the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was dissolved and Emes, the Soviet Jewish newspaper, ceased publication.

Biderman took advantage of a trip to the Soviet Union in 1955 to ask questions (with official "permission" from the Canadian Communist party). Ask questions he did, but his Soviet hosts were not as willing to provide answers other than the official party line, which was often contradictory.

On his return, Biderman began to harbour some doubts. The final straw came in 1956 when Nikita Khrushchev revealed for the first time the atrocities of the Stalin era. When an article appeared in the Jewish press describing the murder of Jewish artists in Lubianka in 1951, "it was like a bombshell, coming on top of the Khrushchev revelations."

Morris Biderman

Biderman quit the party in 1957 and spent the next three years trying to reform UJPO and rid it of its Communist alliance.

It was a bitter three-year battle that took its toll on Biderman and other anti-Communists. The Communist supporters began to disrupt UJPO meetings and to challenge every item raised until many of the older members, tired of the fight, stopped turning up.

"If there was no issue they [the Communists] would invent one. They began to resort to lies and slander," he writes.

Eventually the Communists won, and in 1960, Biderman and others left UJPO and formed the New Fraternal Jewish Association.

Biderman has few regrets these days. "I am not sorry for being a Communist," he writes. "I was never a leader of the party. For all the 30 year, my activity was in the Jewish left-wing [cultural] organizations."

The Jewish left was also doomed for another reason. It was, as Irving Abella writes in the introduction, "a one-generation phenomenon."

As the Jewish immigrants strove to make a just society, through their hard work they made a better life for their children. As their children became successful businessmen and professionals, they saw little need for social reform. And as they became assimilated, they saw little need for Jewish social clubs.

A Life on the Jewish Left is a great chronicle of this fascinating chapter in Canadian Jewish history. Its legacy remains with us today both nationally (labour reforms) and in the continuation of Jewish cultural activities that UJPO and its sister organizations still perform to this day.

Divided island only an hour's flight from Israel

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

NICOSIA — In recent years, a number of Israelis and tourists to Israel have discovered the eastern Mediterranean island of Cyprus as a holiday getaway, be it on a one-hour flight from Tel Aviv or a two to three-day cruise offered from Haifa.

Others were recently introduced to Cyprus when the island played host this May to the Miss Universe Pageant. Glimpses of the exotic country were interspersed between parading international beauty queens, for broadcast around the world.

Cyprus' history is 10,000 years old. The current population of Cyprus is 740,000. The island is 9,251 square kilometres and lies at the crossroads of Europe, Africa and Asia – no wonder it has been a target for invasion for centuries.

For thousands of centuries the Turkish and Greek Cypriots lived together peacefully.

But in 1974, Turkey occupied 37 percent of the land in the north of the island, leaving the capital Nicosia divided.

Almost overnight 200,000 Greek Cypriots were expelled to the south becoming refugees in their own land, while the Turkish Cypriots were ordered to move north to the now occupied territory.

With this forced evacuation, the once thriving north's Greek Cypriot landmarks were destroyed and tourist hot spots deteriorated.

Visitors to the island are able to cross the United Nations buffer zone, but Greek Cypriots are not allowed the same pleasure.

Today, tourism and the economy in what is considered by the world as "free Cyprus" has grown rapidly.

Due to the formation of the Department of Antiquities, a number of archeological discoveries have been unearthed including the Mosaics of Pafos.

Many of the country's priceless treasures have been collected and housed in the Archeological Museum in Nicosia. Unfortunately, many artifacts from the occupied territory no longer exist and reproductions and pictures have to suffice.

Other places to visit on the island include Pafos Aquarium, St. Neophytos Monastery and Pafos' Tombs of the Kings, named for its majestic size although there was no royalty laid to rest there.

There are a number of local excursions one can book from most hotels, including donkey and carriage tours in addition to the more conventional bus or taxi rides.

In Nicosia, visit the Byzantine Museum, Famagusta, one of the three gates of this walled city and Liaiki Yitonia – a pedestrian quarter for great shopping loaded with designer stores and international retail chains.

Not to be missed is Lefkosia, a town known for its silver and lace, and hand woven Irish linen.

Be forewarned, the merchants in this town are aggressive. If you dare venture into a store, you will probably not come out empty handed.

The quaint village of Omodos in the Troodos Mountains has an old wine press. It is no longer in use, but interesting to see just the same. The ancient site of Korion with its amphitheatre offers concerts and theatre year round, including Shakespeare in English, and Greek Tragedy in its original form. Aspiring cantors are free to try out the incredible acoustics when the theatre is not in use.

Greek mythology buffs will gravitate to the Sanctuary of Apollo, Petra tou Romiou – Aphrodite's Rock, the legendary birthplace of the Goddess of Love and the Baths of Aphrodite. A splash of the water from this grotto promises eternal beauty.

The average daytime temperature from June to September is 32C, 16C from December to February and 25C from March to May and October to November. One Cyprus pound equals $2.90 Cdn. Greek and Turkish are the official languages, but English is widely spoken.

Cyprus offers a variety of accommodations to suit every budget from eco-tourist properties to five-star hotels.

Ferries connect Cyprus with the Greek Islands, Greece and Israel. There are 18 Canadian tour operators. However, the most economical way to travel to Cyprus is by taking an air charter to London, then book a British package to either Larnaka or Pafos airports. Cyprus Airways offers daily interline service to Larnaka from London, Amsterdam and Athens.

For more information contact Cyprus Tourism Organisation in New York at 212-683-5280 or e-mail: gocyprus@aol.com. You can also check out http://www.cyprus-tourism.org.

Beautiful stories without the words

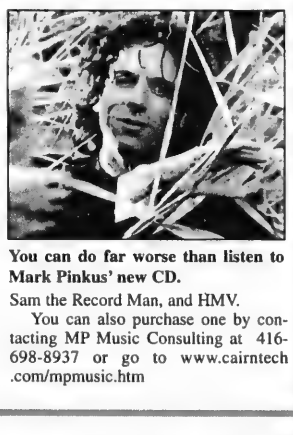
Toronto-based composer/performer Mark Pinkus recently released his fourth CD of piano instrumentals called Breakthrough.

Although Breakthrough will be classed as "New Age" music, it is far from ambient "elevator music." Pinkus' high-octave melodies swirl and cascade over moody time signatures that hold his songs together.

His songs, which have been described as "beautiful stories without words," evoke images and stories much the same way good paintings do.

You can do far worse after a day at work than put your feet up, close your eyes and dream away your stress while listening to Breakthrough.

Breakthrough is available in Toronto at the downtown megastores: Tower, Sam the Record Man, and HMV.



You can do far worse than listen to Mark Pinkus' new CD.

You can also purchase one by contacting MP Music Consulting at 416-698-8937 or go to www.cairntech.com/mpmusic.htm

Top violinist joins Klezmer group

TORONTO — One of the world's leading klezmer violinists will be joining local band Beyond the Pale for two concerts Aug. 5 and 6.

Beyond the Pale with Greenman and accordionist Sasha Luminsky will perform Aug. 5 at the Mill Race Festival of Traditional Music in Cambridge, Ont. at 6 and 9 p.m., and at the Free Times Cafe on Aug. 6 at noon and 1:30 p.m.

Business Profile

Young couple's speakers' agency thrives

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian personalities from hockey hero Paul Henderson to former astronaut Roberta Bondar may well owe their careers in public speaking to Martin and Farah Perelmuter.

Now both 30, the Perelmuters are proprietors of Speakers' Spotlight, a Toronto-based agency they founded in 1995, the year they were married.

Their company has grown steadily since then. Bookings reached the $1 million mark in 1998, and revenues are significantly higher today.

"Our goal," said Farah, "is to remain the best agency, not necessarily the biggest one."

"Our challenge is to keep our numbers manageable so that we can represent our clients effectively," Martin added.

Speakers' Spotlight represents an eclectic core group of 80 speakers, about a quarter of whom are Jewish. They range from author-journalist Peter Newman to television mogul Moses Znaimer.

Usually, the Perelmuters deal with Canadians. But when the need arises, they recruit speakers from the United States, Europe and Australia.

"We made a conscious decision to work with Canadians," explained Martin, a former corporate/commercial lawyer with the Bay Street firm of Goodman Phillips & Vineberg. "American speakers often don't understand the nuances of Canada, and have sometimes proven to be major disappointments."

Speaker typically earns $5,000

Like their competitors, the Perelmuters represent three kinds of speakers – professional speakers, known for their expertise in this or that field; celebrity speakers, basically riding the crest of their fame; and technical speakers, sought out for their knowledge of certain subjects.

Organizations and companies call on their services to deliver motivational or factual speeches. The topics vary widely, from leadership to future trends.

"There is always a need for such speakers," said Farah, a former advertising executive. "Companies and organizations are constantly changing, as is the world, and people want someone to explain these changes."

In booking a speaker, they look for a person who obviously possesses excellent platform skills, but who also brings a combination of experience and credibility.

If the topic is management and organization, they can call on Harry Rosen, the chief executive officer of the menswear chain of stores, or Barbara Moses, one of North America's leading authorities in career development.

Should the subject be media or broadcasting, they can count on seasoned correspondents like Mike Duffy or Peter Kent.

If politics, current events or social issues are the topics, they can reach out to broadcasters Hana Gartner or Daniel Richler.

And so on and so on.

In Canada, a speaker can typically earn $5,000 for a one-hour speech, but the creme de la creme command a maximum of $15,000. In one instance, Nicolas Negroponte, director of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's media lab charged $40,000 (U.S.) for a talk.

By contrast, the fee for high-profile speakers in the United States is seemingly limitless. Christopher Reeves, the disabled actor who portrayed Superman in a series of movies, commands no less than $100,000.

Whatever the fee, the Perelmuters stand to gain a tidy profit. On average, they receive a 25 percent commission for each engagement.

The companies and organizations using their services run the gamut from the Bank of Montreal and IBM to the United Jewish Appeal and Hadassah-Wizo.

When they started Speakers' Spotlight they had no contingency plans for failure. "We went for it," said Martin. "We strongly believed it would work out."

Speakers' Spotlight was Farah's idea. After an uncle asked how he could reinvent himself as a motivational speaker, she did the required research and, much to her surprise, discovered that there were myriad opportunities in this business.

The concept appealed to them because they had dreamed of being self-employed and thus in more control of their lives. "Our objective was to achieve a balanced lifestyle and to enjoy life together," she explained, pointing out that she originally envisaged it as a sideline after starting a family.

Martin and Farah Perelmuter

Convinced that they had a good shot at success, they left their jobs, pouring $25,000 of their savings to launch Speakers' Spotlight. Working punishing hours and scrimping, they broke even in the first year. "No one knew who we were," recalled Martin. "We had no contacts. Our experience was limited."

Their first speaker, the hockey player Paul Henderson, was impressed by their pluck, ambition and trustworthiness. "He was willing to give us a chance," said Martin.

"We discovered that our age was not a hindrance," said Farah. "We were judged on our performance. We were innovative. We gained a reputation for being creative."

In 1996 and 1997, sales increased by some 400 percent. Not having looked back since, the Perelmuters moved to bigger quarters in downtown Toronto, hired more staff, opened an office in Vancouver to serve the West Coast market, established a popular and effective Web site (www.speakers.ca) which gets approximately 50,000 hits a month, and began publishing a spiffy newsletter, The Spotlight.

Martin and Farah still put in 60 to 70 hours per week, but they thoroughly enjoy themselves. "It doesn't seem like work," said Farah, who is expecting her first child in September. "We look forward to it."

Thanks in no small measure to planning and foresight, they have avoided the tensions which can befall couples who are in business together.

"We have defined our roles clearly," said Farah. Martin deals with the day-to-day servicing of clients and with follow-up arrangements. Farah is in charge of marketing and preparing catalogues and media releases.

"Together we strategize and brainstorm," she said.

"We're a married couple first and business partners second," Martin observed.

They met at the University of Western Ontario, where they were students, and started dating in 1993.

Born in Winnipeg, the daughter of Irvin and Toby Vinsky, a dentist and an interior decorator respectively, Farah attended a talmud torah school and the University of Winnipeg before enrolling at Western. After graduating, she took a two-year program at the Institute of Canadian Advertising.

Martin, an Osgoode Hall Law School graduate, was born in Toronto. His parents – Jack, a chartered accountant, and Joanna, a real estate agent – immigrated to Canada from Poland in 1959.

Five years after starting Speakers' Spotlight, they feel blessed. "We're lucky we're doing something we love," said Martin.

"And to be doing it with someone you love," Farah chimed in sweetly.

Fund-raiser for brain tumour research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — We all like to escape the humdrum, everyday world now and then. It's a plus when we can also help a good cause.

You can do both at Play for A Cure, which will be held Aug. 10 at the Playdium Entertainment Centre in Mississauga. It is the first of what it is hoped will be an annual fund-raiser sponsored by the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust.

Money raised will go to brain tumour research and patient care at the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumour Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital.

The 11-acre Playdium offers a variety of activities including rock climbing, go-carting on the Andretti Grand Prix Raceway, miniature golf and beach volleyball. There will also be an outdoor barbecue, live entertainment from the Anita Rossi Band, EQ and Mike Benhaim of the Mandell Entertainment Group, a silent auction and contests.

Some of the Olympic, paralympic and world-class athletes taking part are Warren Sawkiw, baseball; Dawn Watson, pentathlon; Nancy Olmsted, kayak; Deirde Laframboise, equestrian; and Dave Dalziel, archery.

The Cott Corporation, of which the late Gerry Pencer was chair and CEO, is the lead sponsor.

The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust was established in the summer of 1997. The Pencer Brain Tumour Centre, which opened in November 1998, offers relaxation and art therapy, patient and family support services, a newsletter, a patient information binder, a library and treatment of and research into brain tumours.

Tickets for the event will be $125. After 10 p.m., guests can come and party for $25.

For more information or for tickets, call the Play for a Cure hotline at 416-946-2230.

Provincial level athlete

London teen juggles soccer, basketball careers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sabine Goldberg is a two-sport athlete who like other top athletes excels at yet a third activity – juggling.

She's very good at soccer and she loves basketball, but it's thanks to her ability to juggle schedules that she can fit in key roles on two soccer teams, and a couple of hoops squads too.

Goldberg, 16, has her irons in so many fires it's a wonder she doesn't show up for a soccer practice on a basketball day or at a basketball tournament on a soccer day.

This summer she'll work out with Ontario's Under -17 Soccer Team at a training camp in Parry Sound as well as practice regularly in Toronto.

A centre/midfielder who hails from London, Ont., she's also a member of Forest United, a top club team that competes in the Ontario Youth Soccer League and which participates in an endless string of summer tournaments.

At "almost five-foot-three," she's a point guard in the girls basketball Junior Development Program, which brings together the top hoops stars from London, Sarnia, Chatham and Windsor. Although she didn't make the provincial team in that sport, she's got her eyes set on a spot on the Maccabi women's basketball team, which will compete in the 16th Maccabiah Games in Israel next summer.

A veteran of the Toronto Junior Girls Maccabi Basketball Team, which won a gold medal in a tight contest against Baltimore last year, Goldberg will join the team at the youth games in Cincinnati later this summer. Her "number one goal is to go to the Maccabiah Games in Israel," she said.

Having a full schedule seems to suit Goldberg fine. Even at age four, she was a tightly wound bundle of joy who needed an outlet for all her energy, she said.

"I was a very energetic child," she conceded. "I always liked to run, so I guess soccer was a good sport for me."

Goldberg admits she was a reluctant participant at first. "I was more of a dandelion picker who occasionally made a sprint."

Eventually she got into the sport in a big way and by the time she was 13, she was good enough to play on boys' teams and earn their admiration.

"When it comes to attitudes and personalities, boys just don't care while girls are more competitive with each other. The girls singled me out. If you're better than them, they don't want to talk to you. I get more respect from the boys," she said.

Goldberg played for her school, Lucas Secondary, and in May and made the provincial Under-17 squad.

She loves her role as centre/midfielder, a position that gives her plenty of leadership duties.

"I dish out the ball and make the plays. I don't score many goals, that's not in my job description," she explained.

From her position in the centre of the action, Goldberg "can see the field and dish it off. I make the easy pass. I don't have amazing moves to get around defenders," she said, but her coaches are working with her to get her to dribble the ball more and carry it upfield.

Forest United is known as a hard working team, she said. Earlier this season, they played in the Ontario Cup provincial club championships and finished with a 1-2 record.

In June, the team won the Scarborough United tournament and at the Robbie tournament in Toronto, they tied last year's Ontario Cup winners in an early round game, but failed to advance to the playoffs.

When she was chosen for the provincial Under-17 team, "I think I started to cry, I was so happy."

Almost 200 girls were invited to tryouts for the Under-16 and Under-17 teams and Goldberg was one of 48 who advanced to a training camp. She was among 22 girls on the Under-17 team who played in a tournament in Quebec and she expects she'll be in the lineup when the team travels to North Carolina in November for another tournament.

Goldberg's basketball career closely mirrors her soccer exploits. She started playing at around six, at first in a co-ed league. During summers, she participated in basketball camps and in Grade 7, she made the Ramblers, a girls team in the city's top competitive league.

In Grade 10 she was chosen to the Midget Development Program, which brings together the best athletes in the Huron region.

Sandwiched in her regional development program was a stint on the Toronto youth Maccabi team, where she played in two summer games in Detroit and Rochester.

"That was probably the best experience I've ever had in my life," she said. "London has [few] Jewish kids and to see all these kids together was so nice."

In the midst of all her soccer activities, Goldberg still finds time to serve as a counselor at the Gold Medal Basketball Camp and she plays every Monday in the Western League.

Looking past next summer's Maccabiah, Goldberg is hoping to continue her soccer or basketball careers in college.

And which would she prefer?

"I don't know. At times, I love basketball more but I'm better at soccer than at basketball," she said.

Sabine Goldberg (in striped maroon uniform) is seen here playing for Forest United in the Henderson Tournament last year. Goldberg scored one goal in a 4-1 United win.

Volleyball player makes national team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto volleyball star Josh Binstock has been selected to Canada's 2000 Junior National Men's Team, and will train in Montreal this summer.

Binstock, 19, is one of 12 top volleyball players from across Canada to join the team, and the only one selected from Ontario.

Binstock, six-foot-six, 185 lbs., led the Richmond Hill Raiders to a 33-6 season and a third place finish in the provincial championships in November. A member of the Toronto Star's high school volleyball "dream team," Binstock is also a key member of the JCC (Jewish Community Centre) Blues, one of the top club teams in Ontario.

During the summer, the national junior team will prepare for the 2000 NORCECA Junior Men's Championships, August 12-20, in Havana, Cuba. The winner of the event will qualify for next year's 2001 FIVB Junior World Championships.

Chatting about CHAT

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

In an otherwise sleepy summer, the drama (some would say fiasco) over the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's decision to open a northern campus only for students entering grade 9 and who live north of Steeles Avenue, has kept some parents tied up for weeks. In knots.

Some desultory thoughts, in no particular order:

CHAT parents have several concerns, some, in my view, more valid than others. Isolating only grade 9 kids in one building (the newly vacant Richmond Hill High School, north of Major Mackenzie, just west of Yonge Street) will indeed mean that those kids won't get the full high school experience. Parents cite alienation from the rest of the student body, carpool problems, (possibly) greater costs, and lack of extracurricular activities, mainly because the kids will have to be bused to and from school.

That last one carries little weight with me. Everyone in my high school was bused, and many of us happily stayed until six in the evening for sports and clubs. We then either took a late bus or actually boarded public transit. (A lucky few were picked up by parents.) But that was then. Now, kids go home and are then carpooled to piano lessons, soccer practice and karate.

Speaking of which, it is the messing up of carpools that is upsetting many parents. Drivers used to heading south, and perhaps on to work, will now have to rise earlier, go north a fair distance, and then turn around to head south again. Some parents may also face a situation in which a child entering Grade 9 will go to the northern campus, while his or her older sibling will have to attend the one in Downsview. Definitely a wrench in the gears.

But most parents are angry because they feel they were bushwhacked by the news. All this was presented as a fait accompli after kids had gone to camp and parents were becoming accustomed to the idea that come September, their children will be attending the Wilmington campus, along with all the other students.

CHAT has countered that it had to act quickly. School officials say they became aware of the empty high school in mid-June, and made a formal request to lease it two days later.

Now, along comes Howard Shore, vice-chair of the York Region District School Board, who maintains he brought the existence and availability of the Richmond Hill site to the attention of the CHAT board fully 18 months ago, but that the idea was rejected because the school was deemed off the beaten path.

As they say in the British House of Commons, someone is being economical with the truth.

I find two of the parents' arguments distasteful.

One is the notion that CHAT is somehow violating a contract it had with parents. In reality, the school is obliged to educate children; it never specified where. Some parents are actually weighing a legal injunction, at least to freeze plans. What kind of message are we sending our kids when we sue the minute something doesn't go our way?

The other is just offensive: some parents have said, publicly, that there's reason to be concerned because a nearby Baptist church and some Muslim-owned stores will have negative influences on the Richmond Hill students. That's racist, flat out.

All in all, on both sides of the equation, this has not been our finest hour.

About Seniors

Dr. Mark says...

As a geriatrician, I was initially put off by the idea of a book full of interviews with famous people – just because they had attained "a certain age."

But I was wrong.

Of a Certain Age by Naim Attallah (Quartet Books, 1992) is well worth the read. The 14 mostly elderly people featured all have had fascinating pasts.

Mostly Brits, they represent primarily the English uppercrust – a group once described by a wag as "a bunch of crumbs held together by dough."

And some are crumbs – Claus von Bulow and Lady Diana Mosely are two excellent examples. Many are wealthy. But all are worth listening to.

I am not the kind of Jewish reader who divides up members of humanity depending on their attitudes towards us. It is, however, difficult not to be struck by how these old grandees self-differentiate so clearly into two groups: anti- and philo-Semitic.

At one end of the spectrum stands Diana Mosely, the wife of Oswald Mosely, leader of the wartime British Union of Fascists. Today, she lives a quiet, unrepentant life in southern France. Her interview really is a bit awe-inspiring. In it, Lady Diana speaks in a matter-of-fact manner about her close relations with things Nazi.

In stark contrast stands the Irish politician, writer and editor, Conor Cruise O'Brien. He is so unabashedly on the other side: "[My] degree of sympathy for Israel is based on the realization that Israel is the result of horrendously extreme conditions… it's an emotional issue with me."

A more "balanced" view is offered by many of those interviewed.

On the question of the possibility of an afterlife, one which I am sure becomes more pressing with age, Lord Shawcross (chief British prosecutor at the Nuremberg trials) offers the following delightful response: "It may be that as I get nearer the end [he was 90 at the time of the interview], I become more hopeful that the end will not be final, that there might be something beyond it. But it doesn't absorb much of my thinking even now. All I can say is that I have a little hope that I may meet 'round the corner those who have preceded me."

One of the funniest lines in the book comes from Lord Soper stating that the continued existence of the House of Lords has among other things reaffirmed his belief in life after death. (The question for Canadian readers of course is whether milord's comments are relevant to our own Upper House.)

This book is a lovely read, especially if you are interested in the wisdom (and sometimes cant) of an extraordinary stable of old people who have aged along with this century.

Knesset favours early election

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Five bills calling for the dissolution of the Knesset and early elections passed their preliminary readings last Wednesday, dealing yet another blow to Prime Minister Ehud Barak's crumbling coalition. Sixty-one MKs voted in favour of the bills.

David Levy, who had resigned as foreign minister earlier in the day, was among those who supported the dissolution bills, as did his brother, Maxim. All the Knesset factions that stepped down from the coalition in recent weeks – Shas, Yisrael b'Aliyah and the National Religious Party – also voted in favour of the bills, as did United Torah Judaism and One Nation MK Haim Katz.

The first bill up for discussion was submitted by MK Silvan Shalom. It passed with a majority of 61 MKs, with 51 MKs voting against and Shinui's six MKs abstaining. Next were the bills of Yisrael Katz, Abraham Hirchson, Limor Livnat and Avigdor Lieberman, all of which passed with a majority of 61 to 48.

Crumbling coalition

Shalom approached Amnon Rubinstein, chair of the Knesset constitution, law and justice committee, with a request to convene the committee during the Knesset's summer recess, to discuss his bill ahead of its first plenum reading in the winter session. Shalom said he was hopeful that the bill would pass its first reading when the Knesset reconvenes in October. He said that the committee had convened during its 1978 summer recess to discuss and approve a dissolution bill, thus setting a precedent. Rubinstein responded by saying that he would have to discuss the matter with the Knesset's legal adviser, Zvi Inbar.

Quebec shul seized for back taxes

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The synagogue in the Laurentian village of Val Morin has been seized by the municipality for property taxes owing.

The ruling was made by Quebec Court, despite the fact that the three persons under whose name the synagogue is registered are all long deceased.

The sons of two of these men say they were not aware of any tax problem, although neither of them has been involved with the synagogue for many years.

Congregation Ohel Moishe, whose history goes back to the 1930s, had not been used for services for three or four years, said Sam Waxman, who lives in Val Morin 10 months of the year. He had been voluntarily looking after the property.

Waxman was stunned when he went to synagogue in June and found that its outside sign had been removed and a new lock installed.

In the Laurentians

What he later found inside shocked him even more.

"The place had been turned upside down. The benches were moved, the bimah was taken out. The power had been turned off.

"It hurts more than anything. They did not even have the courtesy to tell me beforehand. I've been a member of the synagogue for over 40 years, and was still going in there by myself to pray. I'm the only one who takes any interest in it today," he said. "Whatever expenses there are I pay out of my own pocket."

Waxman said he did not even realize the synagogue was liable for taxes.

The lawyer for Val Morin, Chantal Desbiens, however, told the CJN that all the required legal steps were taken and "no response at all" was received.

Desbiens said about $5,300 was owed by the congregation for the years from 1996-99.

On May 24, Quebec Court ruled that the municipality of Val Morin could take possession of the property, she said. On June 26, Val Morin took a mortgage on the property to get the taxes owed to it, an action which is permitted under sections 2724 and 2725 of the Quebec Civil Code, as well as 982.1 of the Quebec Municipal Code. The 30-day delay for an appeal has since lapsed, she said.

Giorgio Bassani: In memoriam 1916-2000

By RACHELE LONGO LAVORATO
Special to The CJN

With the death of Giorgio Bassani on April 13, Italy lost one of its greatest literary and cultural figures of the 20th century.

Bassani's multifaceted career as poet, novelist and essayist exemplified the complete assimilation of Italian Jews into the intellectual and political landscape of Italy. A political activist who participated in the Resistance, Bassani was arrested as a Jew and partisan in 1943. He subsequently dedicated his career as a writer to the depiction of exclusion and persecution in his society.

Bassani was a member of the editorial staff at the prestigious Feltrinelli publishing house, past vice-president of RAI TV, screenwriter and a professor of history of the theatre at Rome's Accademia Nazionale di Arte Drammatica. However, he will be best remembered and celebrated as the novelist who brought to life the many and diverse characters who populate his narrative universe – the Jewish community of Ferrara.

Ferrara is a city in the region of Emilia-Romagna in Northern Italy, an industrial and agricultural centre situated in the Po Valley. Since approximately 1100, the history of Ferrara has been linked to its Jewish community. Through the centuries, Jewish migrations from Rome, Spain and Germany settled in Ferrara. Initially the Ferrarese Jews were farmers, doctors, shopkeepers, and later, bankers and merchants.

Through the ages, this community distinguished itself with prominent scientists, doctors, engineers, philologists and scholars who contributed extensively to Italian society.

While much has been written about the Holocaust and particularly about the fate of Eastern European Jews, North Americans generally have little awareness of the plight of Italian Jewry.

The racial laws enacted by Mussolini's regime in 1938, the subsequent persecutions and deportations to Auschwitz and Buchenwald, the horrors of concentration camp victims and survivors are an integral part of Bassani's Il romanzo di Ferrara, a collection of novels and short stories first published as a volume in 1974.

If North Americans have a heightened sensitivity today to the Jewish community in Italy, the merit is to be attributed unquestionably to Giorgio Bassani, particularly to his novel, The Garden of the Finzi-Contini (adapted for the screen by Vittorio De Sica in 1971).

In 1938, the racial persecution of the Jews began in Italy with the passing of the anti-Semitic laws whose official purpose was the "defence of the Italian race." These laws included the prohibition of mixed marriages, the exclusion of Jews from military service and public schools, limitations on their activities and holdings, and a prohibition on the Jewish employment of Aryan domestics.

Provisions were also passed barring Jews from employment in military and civil administrations. In 1940, Bassani was forced to publish his first collection of short stories Una città di Pianura under the pseudonym of Giacomo Marchi because of the racial laws in effect.

It was, however, after Sept. 8, 1943, that the true Nazi influence was felt. The presence of German troops in Northern Italy significantly changed the course of events.

Up to this time, racial persecutions in Italy had generally operated along economic, social and financial restrictions. After Sept. 8, 1943, the horrors of deportations, concentration camps and mass-exterminations began.

In The Gold-rimmed Spectacles and The Garden of the Finzi-Contini, the narrator's father and his generation are totally bewildered by the anti-Semitic developments of Mussolini's Fascist party, a party which, for the most part, they had supported. Bassani's prose explores and seeks to understand this conflict.

For Giorgio Bassani the novelist, remembrance and invention were tools in the reconstruction of a very specific period in history, experienced by a very specific community. In Bassani's works, the precise geographical and historical reality of Ferrara during the Fascist era is a reproduction of the microcosmic reality he himself witnessed.

What some people have erroneously perceived as a limitedness of scope corresponds, in truth, to the author's need to come to terms with his own background, his attempt to find a key to understanding the present through the past.

Bassani's is an introspective journey backwards in time, not to relive nostalgically a golden era, but to further the understanding of himself and the people and events that comprise his past.

The focal point, the single most important event, of course, was World War II. This tragic turning point in the lives of so many is used by Bassani as a very definite temporal frame of reference.

Ferrara, the city of Bassani's childhood and adolescence, is the setting of a narrative that seeks to evoke the atmosphere, both social and political, of this historical period.

This precise geographical and historical reality receives further definition in the depiction of the experiences of the members of the broader Jewish community of Ferrara, a community to which the author/narrator and his family belong.

With notably few exceptions, the short stories and novels which comprise Il romanzo di Ferrara are set within a restricted span of time, between 1900 and 1950, and particularly in the years between the promulgation of the racial laws in Italy, 1938, and the end of World War II.

In The Gold-rimmed Spectacles, the story of a noted Venetian otorhinolaryngologist practising in Ferrara is subtly paralleled to the story of the young Jewish narrator. Both intensely feel their exclusion from the rest of society, their apartness, their variance, their own personal scandal – the doctor for his disclosed homosexuality, the young narrator for his Jewishness in a society

Davis moves from campus to UIA Federations

Lance Davis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Informally, so to speak, one might say Lance Davis works in the area of informal Jewish education. But the new director of leadership development at UIA Federations Canada prefers the adjective "non-formal."

"It's serious work. It's just not taking place in a formal setting, with grades," he said in a recent interview, referring to the position he assumed in June, as well as to his five years at Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, most recently as director of education.

At UIA Federations, Davis, 29, has taken on some of the work previously handled by Eli Rubenstein, former director of young leadership development. Rubenstein is staying on as a consultant and national director of March of the Living.

Davis works in partnership with lay leaders, dealing mainly with National Young Leadership (a division of UIA Federations for 25- to-40-year-olds involved in their local federations) and UIA's national women's division.

His current national projects include a Young Leadership conference to be held in Ottawa next April, the development of a leadership education initiative and the development of a Ben Gurion Society (an initiative pioneered in Washington, D.C., several years ago for UJA campaign donors under age 40 contributing $1,000 or more).

Recently Davis accompanied a group of young adults on a Yachdav mission to Israel, a project co-sponsored by UIA.

At one time, he thought his career lay in Jewish advocacy or lobbying. But as a student at Brandeis University's Hornstein Graduate Program in Jewish Communal Service, Davis was "turned on to" informal Jewish education. "I saw it as being one of the most powerful tools we can utilize."

His two years at Hornstein were also significant in more personal ways. Davis, a native of Philadelphia, married his fellow student Julie Sandler, a Torontonian who now cares for their two young sons full time.

He also developed an interest in pluralism that solidified into a passion during his time at Jewish Campus Services, where he initiated annual unity missions to foster understanding and respect among students of different Jewish denominations.

Two years ago, he began working on his PhD in Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto. He plans to focus on pluralism in his research. "I think it's an exciting topic ∴ I wanted to pick something that would have practical applications."

Davis believes that pluralism is implicit in everything UIA Federations does. "It brings together people from all parts of the community. That's part of what attracted me."

On a personal level, Davis, who became observant as an undergraduate at Tulane University in New Orleans, describes himself as "trans-denominational. Titles or labels don't really interest me so much. I really feel as though I can learn from anyone or any group. I don't think anybody has a monopoly on truth and righteousness."

Davis credits Bernie Reisman, now retired as director of the Hornstein program, for opening his eyes to the vitality and viability of a diverse community, and Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services, for the way he put pluralism into practice. "The lessons sank in in Toronto... working with Zac."

Davis stressed that he didn't leave JCS out of any sense of disappointment, but rather that he wanted to take on new challenges.

In fact, he would like to maintain a connection to campus, and facilitate continuity for graduate students, by including them in his new constituency.

Three arrests made in attempted store heist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three men have been arrested in connection with a botched robbery attempt in January which claimed the life of a 23-year-old jewelry store employee.

Niv Erez was killed and store owner Mark Lash, 36, was badly wounded when they were surprised by three men who police believe literally fell out of the ceiling tiles to beset them on Jan.16.

Lash and Erez were preparing to relocate the store to a new location in Richmond Hill, when the suspects are believed to have broken in through the ventilation system, before smashing through the store's drop ceiling.

Erez was shot in the chest and Lash, who has since recovered, was shot in the stomach.

Erez was a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and was known as an outgoing, warm and well-liked young man.

Detective Steve Rowbottom of York Regional Police said recent tips from the public helped solidify evidence that pointed to the three suspects.

Police had been looking for the drivers of a 1995 two-door Mercedes convertible, a 1997 Toyota 4-Runner and a 1987 Chevrolet Caprice Classic.

"Important information came in the last few weeks and tied the investigation together," Rowbottom said.

The suspects are believed to have cased the jewelry store for two weeks prior to the robbery attempt. "It was not a random act; it was not a one-day thing," Rowbottom said.

Arrested in connection with the incident are Shane Zwezdaryk, 29, of Toronto; James Voong, 24, of Toronto; and Giuseppe Marini, 31, of Toronto. They face charges of first degree murder, attempted murder and conspiracy to commit robbery. The suspects are being held in custody pending a bail hearing. The next court date is set for Aug. 24.

Biluim alumni say their goodbyes after their first reunion.

Biluim holds reunion for campers of '61

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eighty percent of the 52 campers who were at Biluim camp in Sudbury in 1961 recently gathered for their first reunion.

"We wanted to be 15 years old again," said Joel Cadesky, now 54, explaining the excellent turnout.

The 41 at the reunion, 22 women and 19 men, came to a lodge near the small Ontario village of Buckhorn north of Peterborough. They sat around in a circle for six hours, Cadesky said, talking about the impact of the two months spent together at the Young Judaea camp, which is now located in the Laurentians, at Ste. Jovite, Que.

They had an oneg Shabbat dinner Friday night, and over the weekend they discussed what they learned about Judaism at the camp.

"It was my first chance to meet other Jews my own age," said Cadesky, who lived in Owen Sound. "We got very close in the two months, roughing it in tents, with no lighting and no heating. We loved it."

It took a committee of 22 to bring it all together, and they managed to get in touch with 50 of the campers, after sending about 75 e-mail messages. They learned that two former campers were too ill to come, and that 12 live outside of Canada – six in United States and six in Israel.

A Web site, only for 1961 Biluim campers, with a picture of the campers is in operation and will be maintained.

The only person they failed to track down was Sandra Bloomfield of Montreal. The committee is still hoping to hear from someone who knows where she is. Malca Jacobs of Montreal was located after an ad was placed. Two Torontonians worked in the same building for years without knowing they were both at the camp. The same was true of two Montrealers.

Benny Landa, owner of a large business in Israel, attended with his wife, leaving in time to get to work in Israel Monday morning.

Also from Israel came Surra Raber, Gail Packus, Tammy Newman and Mira Swirling.

The next reunion is slated tentatively in Israel in five years.

So close do the '61 campers feel to each other, that when Joel Cadesky's son Eric visited Israel, he was hosted by Raber and Newman.

Jeff Groberman of Vancouver, a TV magnate, produced a live, interactive TV show, Who wants to be a Biluim millionaire? on Saturday night, followed by dancing until the wee hours to music of the '60s.

Jeff Dvorkin, originally of Edmonton and now an ombudsman for National Public Radio in the United States, did a three-minute commentary on the reunion on his network.

Among others attending from the United States were Gila Wertheimer (formerly Gail Margolese of Vancouver), owner and editor of the Skokie, Ill., Jewish News.

Judy Garfin of Montreal, an internationally known artist, attended along with others who included the owner of a business with 140 stores, civil servants, a physician, a psychiatrist, a psychologist, insurance agents, independent businessmen, retail sales people, lawyers, teachers and a publisher.

Holocaust memoirs published on the Web

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A book by Yiddish writer Elkana K. Charmatz based on diaries he kept during World War II was recently translated into English.

The work was an extension of a project initiated by Concordia University in Montreal four years ago. The mandate was to collect stories previously unpublished in Canada written by Holocaust survivors living in this country. The manuscripts were circulated to major university libraries and Holocaust centres.

The Charmatz book was translated into English by prize-winning Toronto translator, Miriam D. Beckerman, and it has been posted on the Internet at www.concordia.ca/chair and www.migs.org.

Originally published in Yiddish in 1975, the book was translated into Portuguese in 1976 in Brazil, where Charmatz, his wife Sara and their two daughters lived after the war. The family later moved to Toronto. Charmatz died in 1986.

"Now everyone has access to the stories," said Beckerman, adding that the volume on the Web is titled Nightmares: Memoirs of the Years of Horror under Nazi Rule in Europe, 1939-1945.

Charmatz was a journalist and scholar. He was born in Ostrowiec, Poland, in 1910 and studied at the Gevardik Yeshiva.

He started to write poems and stories as a youngster and went into the plate glass business in Sosnowiec, Poland.

He was arrested in 1940 by the Gestapo and taken to the German labour camps at Birkenau-Auschwitz and Dachau.

Freed by the American army in 1945, Charmatz went to Paris where he worked at the Yiddish newspaper, Undzer Vort (Our Word).

The following year, he settled in Brazil and became the editor of the Yiddishe Press (Jewish Press) in Rio de Janeiro and later in Sao Paulo. He was a pioneer of a Jewish television program in Sao Paulo and created a Jewish radio show in 1954 that continued to air until 1967.

Elkana K. Charmantz

Charmatz, who was a friend of Elie Weisel's, contributed to many international publications and magazines. He received medals from the municipality of Sao Paulo in 1969 and 1974.

In 1985, he won the World Federation of Jewish Fighters, Camp Inmates and Nazi Victims Prize in Tel Aviv.

The translation of his book is the eighth publication in the Concordia project, Memoirs of Holocaust Survivors in Canada. It is a publication of The Concordia University Chair of Canadian Jewish Studies and The Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies.

Charmatz composed his narrative in the postwar years, based partly on the diaries he kept while he was in the ghetto in Poland. He describes in detail the initial response of the Polish Jews to the Nazi invasion and chronicles the establishment of the ghetto in Sosnowiec. He analyses the behaviour of the Germans and the various methods they used to falsify the truth about their plans for the Jews in order to prevent any uprising among the imprisoned Jews.

He tells of his escape from Dachau and the postwar years, his stay in Paris and his travels back to Poland, where he is repelled by local Poles.

The unpublished Holocaust survivor memoirs are co-edited by Prof. Kurt Jonassohn and Prof. Mervin Butovsky.

The foreward of the Charmatz book states: "If you are aware of the existence of such unpublished Holocaust survivor memoirs, please contact Jonassohn or Butovsky."

The book is not for sale and is available only on the Internet or through university libraries and selected Holocaust centres.

Israel pavilion honoured at Brampton's Carabram

TORONTO — The Israel pavilion was a star attraction at Brampton's multicultural festival, Carabram, held on the first weekend in July.

In fact, the pavilion took first place in the food judging and third place in the cultural category. It has received awards since the inception of the festival.

The pavilion is sponsored by Har Tikvah, a Reform congregation in Brampton, assisted by members of the Mississauga and Oakville Jewish communities, as well as other Brampton Jews.

The Incredible Arye presented a magic show, and there was Israeli and Jewish music, including the Klezmer band Beyond the Pale and the team of Aaron and Eric. People watching the show could sit back and enjoy it while sipping Sabra.

The market place featured Judaica items from bagel slicers to jewelry that visitors could have inscribed with a Hebrew or an English name.

The cultural hall featured an Ashkenazi chupah, Sephardi newlyweds in traditional Yemenite wedding garb, Shabbat and holiday tables, a Megillah, and a ketubah.

There was an archeological dig, where the young and young at heart, could dig for artifacts, some of which they could buy.

Visitors could even put notes in the cracks of a model of the Kotel, the Western Wall. These notes were collected at the end of Carabram and sent to the actual Kotel in Jerusalem.

Some of the organizers said they felt especially proud of their success because there was no specifically Jewish presence at Toronto's Caravan festival.

Children are seen digging for pottery in the archeological display. They could buy the little pots they dug up for 50 cents each.

Canaanite canine, Jake, sports ancient lineage

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jake doesn't seem too impressed that his lineage stretches back to ancient Israel and in some ways, mirrors the experience of the Jewish people.

Jake is content to chase the odd squirrel, snooze in the sun and greet strangers, including reporters from The CJN, by sniffing their faces.

Genny Landis with Jake

Oh, and he likes his hindquarters scratched vigorously.

Jake has also won plenty of first-place awards in shows. But then, that's not too hard, given he was the only one of his kind to compete.

In case you haven't figured it out by now, Jake is a dog – but not just any. He's an extremely rare Canaan dog, the only breed of dog to originate in Israel.

According to the Canadian Kennel Club, Jake is among just five Canaans registered in Canada over the past three years. His official name, the one under which he's registered, is Hadar Ha'Aretz Northern Snow, the Hebrew meaning, roughly, to beautify the land.

Also known as Kelev Cana'ani in Hebrew, Canaan dogs were used as guard and herding dogs by ancient Israelites, according to research done by Jake's owner, Genny Landis of Markham.

These canines go back even further. An American breeder has discovered that drawings found on tombs dating to about 2000 BCE depict dogs with an unmistakable resemblance to Jake. A bas relief found on a second century (CE) sarcophagus in central Sinai shows what looks like a Canaan dog chasing an antelope.

When the Israelites were dispersed by the Romans and other conquerors, the dogs returned to the wild, roaming the Negev desert for centuries and earning the classification of pariah dog, a kind of stock.

Things didn't change until 1934, when a German-Jewish couple, the Menzels, immigrated to Palestine to escape the Nazis. He was a veterinarian and she a scientist who studied dogs. They were asked by the Haganah, the pre-state defence force, to develop a canine corps.

The Menzels settled on the Canaans, then still running wild or living among Bedouins, because they were exceptionally hardy and well suited to their environment, having survived for centuries in harsh conditions by their wits. They proved intelligent and highly trainable, and became reliable border sentries, mine detectors, messengers and helpers for the Magen David Adom, Israel's Red Cross. The early state owed them a big debt.

After the War of Independence, the Menzels trained Canaans to be seeing eye dogs.

"Jake is just 2½ years old, but he has a long history," says Landis, 41. "He's very intelligent and gentle."

In 1965, four Canaans were imported from Israel to California. The breed wasn't officially recognized by the Canadian Kennel Club until the mid-1990s, and by the American Kennel Club in 1997.

Today, there are two main types of Canaan dog: the kind imported to the United States, and a heavier, more thick-coated type favoured by breeders in Israel.

According to dog experts, Canaans are devoted, inquisitive, loyal, alert and move with a brisk, athletic grace. Jake also makes sure that neighbourhood cats know who's boss.

Earlier this year, Jake flew to Minneapolis to be bred with Tovah, also a Canaan. They hit it off, producing a litter of six multi-hued puppies a month ago.

The pups, the first such litter, were born at a kennel called Mazel Tov Canaan Dogs.

Passing the buck

It is hard to think of a more devastating indictment of a host than causing the death of his guests. Yet that is precisely what occurred three years ago during the opening ceremonies of the 15th Maccabiah Games in Israel. Four members of the Australian team died as a result of the collapse of a footbridge over the polluted Yarkon River and scores of others were injured, many seriously. What was supposed to have been a time of brotherhood and the fulfilment of a Zionist dream, turned instead into a nightmarish experience of grief, bitterness and disillusionment.

Angry relatives of those killed and injured have not let the issue rest. They have steadfastly – and rightly – criticized the Maccabi World Union (MWU), organizers of the Games, for not taking responsibility for the tragedy. They have demanded that MWU president Ron Bakalarz and chair Uzi Netanel resign.

Since the events of 1997, the MWU has played an unseemly game of pass the buck, blaming everyone except themselves for the tragedy. It was the engineer's fault, the contractor's fault, the builder's fault – everyone's fault but their own.

The lack of resolution of the affair has led to a sad strain in relations between the staunchly Zionist Australian Jewish community and Israel. Things have gotten so bad that, in addition to personal lawsuits that have been filed, Australian Jews had promised a chilly reception for Israeli athletes at the Sydney Olympics. Major Australian Jewish organizations and the World Jewish Congress have criticized the MWU, the Australian ambassador to Israel has raised the issue and Canadian parliamentarian Irwin Cotler has expressed concern over a growing rift between Australian Jewry and Israel.

Now, in the wake of a damning report by a Knesset committee, Netanel has resigned but Bakalarz clings stubbornly to his position.

Bakalarz should step down immediately. Such a move would serve as an indication that the MWU takes moral responsibility for the tragedy, and it may begin to heal the rifts that have developed with Australian Jewry. It would be a move long overdue.

But another question needs to be asked. Where has Maccabi Canada been through all of this? Why hasn't it added its voice to those demanding accountability of the MWU leadership? In the wake of the tragedy, Maccabi Canada President Roy Salomon flew to Australia to try to mend fences, but he has steadfastly rejected calls for the resignations of MWU officials.

It's hard to imagine that the hundreds of Canadians who participated in the 1997 Games believe it should be business as usual at the MWU. After all, it could just as easily have been Canadian athletes killed as a result of MWU negligence as it was Australians.

Maccabi Canada should add its voice to those demanding Bakalarz's resignation. It owes it to the athletes who will attend next year's Games who must have confidence that their stay in Israel will be a happy and safe one, not one tinged by fear and concern. –P.L.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Looking for uncle

I am looking for a person named Shmuel Glaser. He was born in 1912 in Poland. He was a survivor of the Holocaust, but his son was killed by the Nazis.

After the war he joined his family (parents, brothers and sister) in Israel. In the early 1950s he went to Canada, probably to Toronto or Montreal.

I am the son of his brother Gedalia (Gustav) and I am looking for a way to contact him. If you have any information about Shmuel Glaser, please contact me. I will appreciate your help.

Jerusalem belongs to the Jews

I am outraged at the so-called Middle-East "peace talks" at Camp David and at Prime Minister Ehud Barak's consideration of giving away half of Jerusalem to the Palestinians.

All historical Jewish claims aside, Israel acquired Jerusalem fair and square in a battle that Israel did not start. That Yasser Arafat has the chutzpah to say he will settle for nothing short of half of Jerusalem attests to his insanity and Barak's utter weakness in even entertaining the idea. What right do the Palestinians have to east Jerusalem? What have they done to deserve even an inch of what is for Jews unarguably the most historically significant and holiest place? A place that we acquired through so much blood and suffering? Give it away because Arabs happen to live there?

Jerusalem belongs to the Jews. As does the Golan. As does what remains of the West Bank. And to give in to international pressure at the expense of our national body and soul is suicide. How can intelligent Israeli leaders – with military backgrounds no less – blatantly ignore the historical truth that giving away land has never brought peace to Israel. The Arabs simply want what the Jews have and will never be satisfied until what we have is nothing.

I hope that Israel, her leaders and Jewish people around the world soon wake from their reverie that peace will come from giving the shirt off our back to people who want nothing less than to wipe us off the face of the map.

Camp David negotiators made progress

The conclusion of the Middle East summit without an agreement should not destroy hopes for an Israeli-Palestinian peace treaty. After all, even Moses had to ascend Mt. Sinai a second time before the Israelites received the Ten Commandments. Despite the disappointing outcome, it's heartening that the negotiators made substantial progress on all the contentious issues, even Jerusalem. Saeb Erekat, a senior Palestinian negotiator, predicted that an agreement was likely before the Palestinians' self-imposed deadline of Sept. 13. But that will only be possible if two things happen. Yasser Arafat must reconsider his all-or-nothing stance on east Jerusalem. At the same time, Ehud Barak must not make the mistake of forming a national unity government with the Likud, which truly would put peace beyond reach.

Students praise mentor

We would like to thank Paul Lungen for a wonderful feature article on a most beloved and respected rabbi in our community, Rabbi Nachum Berlat. As former students in his chaplaincy training program, we can attest to all that has been written about Rabbi Berlat. During our two-year course, we were constantly amazed by his wealth of knowledge in all areas. Having had him as our teacher and supervisor was an experience that we will cherish forever.

Tisha b'Av launches the redemptive process

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

It is quite clear that we do not set the agenda or the dates for Jewish celebrations and commemorations.

The best proof, as if we needed any proof concerning this, is Tisha b'Av, the 25-hour fast that recalls and ostensibly mourns the destruction of the Holy Sanctuary (Bet HaMikdash) twice in our harrowing history.

If we were given the choice, we probably would opt to avoid such a day of dirge. Were we told that we have no choice about observing Tisha b'Av, but we do have a choice regarding the date to fast, we would have likely chosen a cold, short, winter day.

Instead, we have Tisha b'Av on a warm, muggy, uncomfortable and long summer day, which also breaks up the enjoyment focus of the summer.

Tisha b'Av, to be blunt, is not particularly popular. Congregational services on that day are not full to overflowing. Many people are not even aware of Tisha b'Av, when it is, what it is.

On the list of Jewish days to observe, Tisha b'Av is low down for many, and for many more not even on the list. And such days as Simchat Torah trump Tisha b'Av all the time. Why? Because people generally prefer dancing and parties to mourning and melancholy.

But whatever our preferences, Tisha B'Av is with us. There is no escape. And though Simchat Torah trumps Tisha b'Av in the minds of the general population, we should not forget the immortal words of King Solomon — "It is preferable to go to a house of mourning than to a house of partying..." (Ecclesiastes, 7:2).

In this very verse, King Solomon offers an explanation for the observation just cited – "for that is the end of all people, and the living should take it to heart." King Solomon's logic is that since everyone is destined to die, by going to a house of mourning we are reminded of our mortality and will therefore take stock of our lives. Parties divert our attention from these important, critical endeavours.

Living is a serious business. True, we are better off being happy and joyous in our approach to life, and indeed must be, but that very happiness and joy must be serious happiness and joy. Witness the reminder of Tisha b'Av that we experience at all weddings. We shatter a glass to culminate the wedding ceremony. The shattering reminds us, among other things, of the shattering experiences in our history, most notably the destruction of the two Holy Sanctuaries, which occurred on Tisha b'Av.

But why break up the surpassing joy of the wedding with this recollection of destruction and tragedy? Is it because we are unhappy at seeing other people being happy? Banish such thoughts.

This custom is intended to remind the bride and groom, and indeed everyone in attendance, that happiness is not attained via the artificial means of drinking wine, for example. We break the cup which holds the wine. Instead, happiness, personal and communal, is rooted in seriousness, in sober appreciation of the ups and downs of life, of history, and integrating these into our own lifestyles.

The fast of Av by Yehudo Epstein (1870-1945) from the Sotheby's catalogue.

If we are happy in marriage merely because we have gained a partner who will bestow joy and laughter, we have married for the wrong reason. If we have married to share and actualize values together, to help each other become better people, to collectively embrace our responsibilities and support each other in meeting the challenge of that embrace, then we have more fully apprehended the meaning of coming together. In other words, we seek not happiness itself, but the proper conditions and fulfilments from which a state of satisfaction and happiness will almost automatically ensue.

Likewise, as reflected in the profound words of Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, the mourning associated with Tisha b'Av is a lament not so much that the Holy Sanctuaries were destroyed, but that they had to be destroyed. We lament the conditions which prepared the way for destruction.

We learn from our tradition that the two Sanctuaries "had to be" destroyed because of a breakdown in our value system, a compromised adherence to our responsibilities, and in the case of the second Bet HaMikdash, a societal breakdown, an unacceptable negative attitude to others, love replaced by hate. (Talmud, Yoma 9b) The Talmud is very clear in stating that in the time prior to the second devastation, religious observance was not an issue. The people were observant, but they were not getting along. They were fighting with each other, sniping at each other.

When such unholy conditions prevail, the rationale for having a holy place is severely dented. Holy exercises in the Holy Sanctuary become hypocrisy. Holiness itself is profaned, literally destroyed. The spiritual denuding of the sense of holiness preceded and precipitated the physical destruction of the Holy Place.

We do not run away from this. We do not pretend that matters are acceptable when they are not. We do not gloss or sugarcoat reality in order to look good. One of our great strengths throughout history has been our ability to be honest with ourselves, to acknowledge failing and to embark on a corrective course. We may have engaged in this pattern more than we would like, but at least we have engaged.

So, the focus on Tisha b'Av is less on what others did to us, and more on what we did to ourselves. We focus on how the internecine strife within the community created a glaring vulnerability to attack from external forces. We try to learn the lessons of this, and to not repeat the errors.

Frankly, it would be folly to spend an entire dour day just recounting how an external enemy besieged Jerusalem and eventually brought about its devastation. That is history, important history no doubt, but surely not the stuff to transmute a full 25-hour day into a period of pretty intense mourning.

Mourning is more associated with a present reality. Taking our cue from the aforementioned Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, the mourning of Tisha b'Av, contemporary vintage, is for the conditions we created that allowed the tragedies to unfold. Have things changed? Have we learned from then what we should be doing now?

This year, as we gear up to Tisha b'Av, we cannot help but look east, to our brothers and sisters in Israel. The recently truncated peace talks at Camp David apparently came unglued over the status of Jerusalem. We need to make sure that the glue which holds us together does not unravel over Jerusalem, or over anything else.

We know from previous Tisha b'Av experiences how incendiary the issue of Jerusalem can be. We also know how vulnerable we become when we are not glued together in fundamental togetherness, no matter how different our attitudes to the peace process or other matters may be.

Much like the broken glass at the wedding, Tisha b'Av breaks up the joy of summer. We are reminded every year that joy, contentedness, and relaxation that are removed from our historical reality suffer from this detachment. The allure of relaxation is great, but the fulfilment that derives from sober and serious attention to the important personal and communal matters ultimately trumps relaxation.

There is a less well known but important other side to Tisha b'Av. In the Book of Lamentations (Aykhah), the megillah that is read on this day of communal mourning, Tisha b'Av is referred to as a mo'ed, or appointed time (1:15).

Mo'ed has joyous connotations. Biblical references to mo'ed are invariably related to the joyous festivals. Admittedly, the term mo'ed as used in the Book of Lamentations is not at all employed in a joyous context. Nevertheless, the use of this term is seen as a signal to give Tisha b'Av an additional dimension.

We project this sense of mo'ed on Tisha b'Av by removing a special supplication called Tachanun from the prayer inventory of that day. This normally daily entreaty is eliminated on all festive occasions, such as Pesach, Shavuot, Sukkot, Chanukah, Purim.

This may seem to be a very small and insignificant gesture, but in so doing Tisha b'Av is placed in pretty happy company – not a small or insignificant gesture at all. And this placement is deliberate. We see Tisha b'Av as the Jewish historical low point. But low points have an upside. If we are at the lowest point, then matters can only improve. We see the redemptive process as being launched on Tisha b'Av.

Tisha b'Av is a mo'ed, an appointed time, a time appointed for realizing how we veered off track, and how we now resolve to get back on track. If we do that, we will transmute Tisha b'Av from a day of melancholy into a day of celebration. That time may be a bit far off, but we will only get there if we do the appropriate lamenting now.

Saluting Charles Bronfman

There is no question that Bronfman is Canada's most prominent Jewish name, despite the much-touted sale of Seagram. A recent event in the family's history moves me to pen this article.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

On June 15, Charles, Sam Bronfman's youngest child, was honoured by the University of Toronto with an honorary doctor of laws degree. I had good reason to accept the University's invitation to participate in the ceremony, because I have long harboured a special affection for Dr. Charles.

It goes back to the mid-'70s when we first became acquainted, a relationship that blossomed into friendship. I had always found him especially attractive, in part because he managed to hide his considerable mental acumen behind a veil of modesty. When in 1977 I became president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Charles agreed to be one of the officers — and his participation was highly useful to the organization.

Since those days, Charles has become one of Canada's great assets, a privy councillor and a companion of the Order of Canada.

Quebecers remember him primarily because it was he who brought Major League baseball to Montreal. He acquired the Expos and guided the team for many years with a special passion that made him one of Montreal's best known citizens. When René Lévesque became the province's premier, championing a separatist program, Charles Bronfman was one of his staunchest opponents.

For Jews, Charles will always be remembered for two innovative activities: He, together with his friend the late Ray Wolfe, introduced the first supermarket to Israel and thereby initiated a new era in Israeli marketing. I still remember when the original Supersol store was opened, and Israelis flocked to it in amazement.

More recently, it was Charles who initiated Birthright Israel, a program designed to enable Jewish youngsters to visit Israel and thereby intensify their Jewish identity.

In addition, he has been active in supporting many of Canada's cultural aspirations.

The ceremony at Convocation Hall was moving, and his response displayed his usual modesty.

A few days later, the Globe and Mail reported in its business section: "Bronfmans Win in Seagram Deal." The name is never out of the news, for the Seagram empire embraces a great variety of business opportunities in areas like entertainment and music.

On the world scene, Charles' older brother Edgar serves as the president of World Jewish Congress. Together, the two have made their name identical with Jewish activism and concern. Charles, like Edgar, now resides in New York, but their Canadian roots will always be a significant aspect of their identity. It is a special pleasure to salute my friend, Charles Bronfman.

It's time to say goodbye

Here she is. Canadian Jewish News column number 27. Two years of submissions. Have I come full circle? Have I deviated from my mandate?

Ideally, a little of each.

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

I am spending the last of five summers at a sleep-away camp in Green Lane, Penn. I have met amazing people, stored up unforgettable memories, forged many friendships, and learned a lot about myself, my peers and how to take care of others.

This summer I am one of two counsellors in charge of 29 15-year-old girls. While at times the job is challenging, I find that these teenagers possess a certain sensibility towards the world and others' needs. This has rendered my job far more intriguing. Many of these girls were my campers last summer. Seeing them as they disembarked from the buses that brought them to camp this summer, I immediately noticed the physical changes that might have been made over the course of the winter. This one no longer has braces, another is wearing contact lenses instead of glasses, a third has acrylic nails to hide her bitten stubs.

One physical change I instantaneously recognized but dismissed as meaningless was that many of my campers now had extremely long hair. Whereas I went for the shorter look to avoid having to deal with a mane that is not manageable in the humidity and heat or when I'm simply in a rush, it appeared that at least eight of my campers had not cut their hair since the fall.

It was a reunion overflowing with excitement – the excitement of being back at camp and of not having seen each other in 10 months. We made small talk: "How was your winter?"or "How was the ride up to camp?" and we shlepped their bags to our cabin.

That afternoon, I nonchalantly made a comment to one of my campers from New York that her hair had grown very long.

She replied, "I'm growing it until I have seven inches to cut for L for L."

Not entirely sure what L for L stood for, I inquired.

"Locks for Leukemia. They take seven inches of hair to make wigs for females with leukemia."

Wow, I thought. At an age when physical appearances are so important, when long hair doesn't suit everybody, the idea that she was making such a sensitive commitment overwhelmed me. Only one thing could overwhelm me more. Within seconds, three of my Floridian campers and one from New Jersey explained that they had the same goals.

You can learn the most amazing things in most unexpected places. I anticipated learning about 15-year-olds' fashions, makeup habits and boy infatuations, but never about such a meaningful program that seemingly has involved teens across the country. That's when I realized that you should never block your ears or cover your eyes. The world has too much to offer and the people of the world have too much to share.

* * *

I would like to take this final opportunity to thank all my readers for having been loyal. Many of you stopped my grandmother in the supermarket to tell her how much you liked what I wrote (even those pieces that I was less than satisfied with). It's nice to know that people read what you write. I apologize if it wasn't always clear where I was coming from or if it seemed as though I was trying to deal with too many issues in one column. My mother did teach me never to talk with a mouth full.

I am unsure what the future holds, but I hope to provide you with more Erica Horn anecdotes for your reading pleasure. Please keep your eyes open.

Final words of advice: Hold your breath. The future implies uncertainty. Go Expos go. If you build it, he will come. That's all she wrote, folks.

Returning to basics

"Who is a Jew?" my professor asked almost three years ago. He answered his rhetorical question with: "One who does not worship idols." But the matter was promptly forgotten and the next eight months were spent discussing Christian philosophy and the movements that developed from those beliefs.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

Though ignored in my academic life, "Who is a Jew?" has consumed me ever since. In first year, it was my friends who asked the question and demanded an audience. Many had had little or no contact with Judaism before they met me and they gobbled up every new word and new custom.

I was a cultural/religious ambassador, overwhelmed by the things I could not explain and the realization that life in my Jewish suburb was a sheltered one. I feared giving my audience the wrong answer, or worse, not giving any answer at all.

The year ended, their curiosity satisfied, and I was relieved of my duties. Then came this column. For two years, in 26 articles (including this one), I wrote about being a Jewish student in an un-Jewish town. Every month I answered to you, the reader. It was my job to share my opinions and know there was a possibility that I would be seen as a bad Jew.

I was afraid you would discover that I did not live up to your standards, that I would offend my family, that I would be seen to be more than I was. I recall a day when a fellow Jewish student was afraid he offended me by eating a slice of pepperoni pizza in my presence.

Who am I to judge? How did I become the embodiment of all things Jewish?

In my group of friends in Halifax, I'm referred to as "the Jewish one." There is more to me than my religion, but it defines me in their eyes and some days in my own as well. I fall easily into the role of Jen the Jew. But I'm tired of role. On the flip side, I'm burdened with guilt because I know that I am not the epitome of Judaism.

Way back in column number 1, I referred to the Ancient Greek saying, "Know thyself." That's what I have tried to do. Self-revelation on a monthly deadline. A little more public than normal, but that's what I've tried to do for two years. Write my way to personal discovery; and this is where it ends.

This is my last column. I feel it necessary to return to basics for the subject matter – who is a Jew and what Judaism means to me. Though the topic of my articles was Jewish student life in Halifax, it was seen through my observations, questions and biases.

So what are my last words on the matter? Since I've now rewritten this column five times, it's obvious that I don't have a clue. Chunks of me are tired of the whole subject. Let me be someone else for awhile. Let me be more than "the Jewish one."

In the distance, I see more questions looming. Scary questions about what is a Jew. The answers will either cement my current beliefs or shove me onto an entirely new path and direction. I don't want to face them, I don't want to question myself anymore, but that wouldn't be a very Jewish thing now, would it?

This is where we part. This is where I stop pleasing everyone else and face my guilt and fears.

Know thyself. I'm trying. Oy, I am trying.

Looking back at the War of Attrition

Israel was in a euphoric mood when the 1967 Six Day War ended. Although Israel's casualties had been fairly steep – 338 fatalities on the Sinai front, 300 on the West Bank and 141 on the Golan Heights – the country shone with pride and cockiness as it basked in its swift victory. Little could Israelis have known that a new, protracted conflict awaited them. Within weeks, the War of Attrition, as it came to be known, broke out. It raged mainly on two fronts, the Jordan Valley and the Sinai Peninsula. On the West Bank, Israel clashed with the PLO in a fullblown guerrilla war that occasionally pulled in Jordan. In Sinai, Israel fought the Egyptian armed forces on land, air and sea.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The nearly forgotten War of Attrition in the Sinai was a more high-stake confrontation in terms of the forces arrayed, the intensity and duration of the battles, and the geo-political significance. It lasted for three years, from July 1967 until July 1970, and was terminated by an American-brokered ceasefire that Israel and Egypt accepted on Aug. 6 and Aug. 7, respectively.

At the close of the Six Day War, Egypt lay beaten but resolutely unbowed. "What was taken by force must be restored by force," then Egyptian president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, declared defiantly.

On July 1, 1967, the first shots of the War of Attrition rang out when Egyptian commandos ambushed an Israeli patrol on the eastern bank of the Suez Canal. Major Uriel Menuhin, the commander of an armoured company, was hit. He was the first Israeli soldier to fall in the War of Attrition. It was a grinding war of snipers, artillery and tank duels, commando forays and aerial dogfights. On July 11, a further nine Israeli soldiers were killed in another raging battle, a foretaste of the pain Israel would endure, and mete out.

Nasser and his defence minister, Gen. Mohammed Fawzi, were determined to regain the Sinai. They formulated a strategy based on three stages: the "defensive rehabilitation" phase, the "offensive defence" phase, and the "liberation phase." Nasser's strategy, which was contingent on rebuilding the shattered Egyptian army, was dependent on assistance from the Soviet Union, his chief weapons supplier. Israel was backed by the United States. In the context of the Cold War, the War of Attrition was thus a proxy war.

Egypt initiated a new round of hostilities in September when it fired on Israeli ships in the Gulf of Suez. Nasser, at an Arab summit in Khartoum, had signed a declaration laying out Egypt's policy toward the Jewish state: no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with Israel, and no peace with Israel. Egypt's aggressive military posture was precisely designed to drive home that point. As the fighting escalated, Israel shelled Suez and Ismailia. In October, the Egyptians fired a Styx missile from Port Said and sank the Eilat, an Israeli destroyer, with the loss of 47 sailors. Once again, Israel pounded refineries and oil depots in Suez and Ismailia, causing immense property damage and triggering the flight of about 700,000 civilians.

The next major flareup occurred in June 1968 when Egyptian gunners bombarded Israeli positions along the length of the canal. In September and October, Egypt unleashed two more massive bombardments. By now, Egypt had positioned 150,000 soldiers in the canal region and had reorganized and re-equipped its army.

In response to these attacks, Israel struck the Nile Valley. Heli-borne commandos destroyed bridges, an electric transformer and a switching station in Qena and Najh Hamadi. Shocked by Israel's audacious moves, Egypt called for a de facto ceasefire.

During this interval, there was a debate on how Israel could best bolster its defences and save the lives of its exposed soldiers. Gen. Ariel Sharon, director of training, believed that the Sinai could be defended by mobile armoured activity. Gen. Chaim Bar-Lev, the chief of staff, favoured a system of fixed fortifications along the canal, with artillery and armour in the rear. Bar-Lev prevailed. As the Bar-Lev Line – the largest engineering project ever undertaken by Israel, according to Chaim Herzog in The Arab-Israeli Wars – was being finished in March 1969, Egypt renewed the war. In a headline incident, Israeli mortars crashed into an Egyptian bunker in the northern sector, killing Gen. Abdul Munim Riad, the Egyptian chief of staff, and several of his aides.

Nevertheless, Egypt pressed ahead with its offensive, prompting Israel to attack targets in the Nile Valley yet again and on the western shore of the Gulf of Suez.

On May 1, Nasser, boasting that 60 percent of the Bar-Lev Line had been demolished, announced that the war had now moved to the "liberation" phase. Nasser was confident that he could wear down Israel in a static war in which manoeuvrability did not count for much. He was also keenly aware that Israel was sensitive to casualties. In May, June and July, Nasser's gunners, snipers and commandos killed 47 Israeli soldiers. During this period, the United States and the Soviet Union tried without success to defuse the situation.

Moshe Dayan

In July 1969, after the arrival of the first batch of F-4 Phantom fighter-bombers from the United States, Israel began using its air force as flying artillery. The Israelis hammered artillery emplacements and SAM-2 surface-to-air missile bases. Swirling dogfights erupted in which Israel usually had the upper hand. Egypt stepped up the pace of its pinprick attacks across the canal.

On Sept. 9, less than two months after Israeli commandos stormed an Egyptian fortress on Green Island in one of their most daring raids, Israel dispatched a tank column across the Gulf of Suez. It drove southward, destroying two army camps, shore batteries and radar stations, and killing hundreds of Egyptian troops, including a general. Retaliating, Egypt launched waves of aircraft to pound Israeli positions. In a matter of hours, Israel shot down 17 MIGs and Sukhoi Su-7s for the loss of one of its own planes.

In December, as Egypt pushed new SAM-2 batteries perilously closer to the canal, Israel countered with an eight-hour bombing campaign, its biggest since the Six Day War, and a series of commando incursions. Its most spectacular raid took place on Dec. 26, when paratroopers landed in Ras Gharib and seized a Soviet-made P-12 radar used to track low-flying aircraft. As a result, Israel was able to improve its electronic countermeasure warfare capabilities.

On Jan. 7, 1970, the Israeli air force mounted a blitz against targets deep inside Egypt. As Benny Morris observes in Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, its purpose was to force a ceasefire on Nasser. Israel's defence minister, Moshe Dayan, was sanguine that it would succeed.

Alarmed by Israel's tactic, Nasser flew to Moscow. He asked former Soviet president Leonid Brezhnev for new SAM-3s, improved SAM-2s and additional Soviet military advisors. By June 1970, some 10,000 such advisors, including 150 pilots who flew operational missions, were stationed in Egypt.

Throughout the winter of 1970, Israel carried out deep-penetration raids into Egypt. In two instances, Israel accidentally bombed a school and a machine shop, causing scores of civilian deaths, as well as outrage throughout the Arab world. Shortly afterwards, in April, Israel stopped these raids. Observers concur that they were basically a failure, as they did not curb Egypt's belligerency, and led to direct Soviet intervention.

On May 30, Egyptian commandos ambushed an Israeli patrol, wiping out 18 soldiers in one fell swoop, the worst single day for Israel in the war. Meanwhile, Soviet advisors continued building a more effective air defence screen around the canal. Upping the ante in July, Soviet-piloted jets joined the fray. On July 30, Israeli pilots downed five Egyptian MIGs flown by Soviet pilots.

This incident hastened the end of the war. Joseph Sisco, an American diplomat who had been shuttling through the Middle East since April trying to defuse it, used this dogfight to call a halt to the fighting. Sisco promised Nasser that a ceasefire would be based on U.S. secretary of state William Rogers' plan. It envisaged a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt on the basis of a complete Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai.

Both sides were basically pleased with the truce. Israel had lost 367 soldiers, and Egypt many more. And the cost of prosecuting the war had really been beyond Israel's and Egypt's means.

The ceasefire held up for about three years. It was violated by Egypt (and Syria) on Oct. 6, 1973, the first day of the Yom Kippur War, a war which paved the way for Israel's historic rapprochement with Egypt.

Thirty years after the last shots were fired in anger, the War of Attrition is remembered today as the war that readied the combatants for yet another round of bloodletting.

Jewish Life

A singular person

Rodinsky's Room* by Rachel Lichtenstein & Iain Sinclair Granta $44.50

In 1969, David Rodinsky, an Orthodox Jew and reclusive scholar, disappeared. His cluttered garret above a synagogue in the heart of the old Jewish East End of London remained undisturbed for 20 years.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Rachel Lichtenstein, a half-Jewish 29-year-old London sculptor, became fascinated with Rodinsky's strange history when workmen unsealed his room above the dilapidated and unused synagogue. Still in the room were dust-covered notebooks in Hebrew and other languages, annotated maps, kabbalistic charts, religious texts and personal effects.

Who was this mysterious figure? What had happened to him? Where had he come from? How had he become a kind of urban legend?

Her imagination captured, Lichtenstein, whose grandparents had escaped from Poland in the 1930s, begins a decade-long journey that takes her both inward and outward. She finds new meaning in her own Jewish roots and identity and then spirals outward to encompass a cross-section of London's Jewish community, a trip to Israel and a shtetl in Poland. She interviews numerous persons who might contribute information about the elusive Rodinsky.

Increasingly involved in Jewish life she changes her last name from Laurence to the family's original Lichtenstein. In Poland she discovers a long lost aunt who had survived Auschwitz.

Ultimately, she discovers much about Rodinsky: how his family had fled persecution in Poland, his 10 years as a child living with an English foster family and the mental asylum in Surrey where it seems he died of pneumonia and emotional problems.

She tells a Jewish social worker, "I did not think Rodinsky was mad, only greatly misunderstood – the culture he came from was not translatable. He agreed with me: 'The Longrove was the kind of place that was full of kabbalistic geniuses and religious scholars wrapped up in the world of metaphysics. In that period there were many mistakes made. Many of the nurses were Asian, many of the doctors from Middle Europe; there were very serious communication problems.'"

As she discovers more and more about Rodinsky, Lichtenstein's mission turns to finding his grave and telling his story stripped of romantic myth and unwarranted speculation.

When the grave is found, she writes, "It was much as I had expected. There was no headstone, just a shallow gravel plot with a broken concrete border and a small tin plaque that read: 'David Rodinsky, March 5th, 1969.' Finally I opened my prayer book and together we read the Kaddish traditionally read by the son of the deceased, but as there was no son to perform this task, I took it upon myself. Before leaving, we both placed a stone on his grave."

Iain Sinclair, the book's co-author, a British novelist and poet, is a semi-detached observer of Lichtenstein's quest and obsession. His chapters, which are interspersed throughout the work, tend to become turgid and high-flown. They offer an additional dimension of psychological analysis and probing, but tend to detract from the directness of the account.

Part mystery story, part memoir, part travelogue – this is a beautifully written and unusual book about a singular person and a world that has all but vanished.

1948: Into the unknown

By RABBI YECHIEL BEN AYON

Jack had just come home for the evening and his father, Rav Israel, stood at the doorway looking at him. It was a look Jack had never seen before, but one he would not soon forget. This was Morocco, the year was 1948 and the air was heavy with tension. The United Nations had declared Medinat Yisrael. Viewing Israel as an enemy . state, the Arab world responded by declaring war on the Jewish state.

At this time, Israel was in dire need of many things, and leading the list was people. With many more people, the country could survive. Covertly, Israel sent emissaries to Arab lands to promote and to facilitate aliyah. It was an open secret that people were leaving.

Rav Israel, a pious man, had resolved to take his family to Israel. He had gone out into the market place inquiring about the "Zionists," those locals who worked hand in hand with the Israelis. He wished to be put in contact with one.

Wherever he turned he was met with laughter. Only when someone informed him that his own son, Jack, was one of the regional ringleaders did he understand the laughter.

Jack understood the look. It was a strange combination that at once bespoke pride — "that's my boy," fear — "you're in this deep," disbelief — "I had no clue," betrayal — "how could you?" relief — "you're OK," joy — "we will be going" and rebuke — "don't you ever again."

It was a confusing situation for the Jews. They had lived a relatively amicable existence for a thousand years in Morocco. Life was good; loyalty and even love was staunchly with the king.

Suddenly, all was in question. The emergence of the State of Israel brought everything into chaos. Families and communities were unravelling, dreams and aspirations colliding. To leave the magic and majesty of North Africa for the perils of a nascent and violent Mideast; to forgo home and security, financial stability and predictability for instability and the unknown; or to stay in an environment brewing with hostility? Was this the chance of a lifetime, a possible miracle of historic proportion or the mistake of a lifetime?

Egoz, which premiered at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, is the latest production of Elie Cohen (Summer of Aviya, Under the Donim Tree, Ricochets.) In it, Cohen tackles the complex issues of this era immediately following Israel's independence. They are presented through the true story of the vessel Piccs, which sank along with all 44 passengers while on a clandestine voyage to Israel.

The story is told through a fictional family in Morocco. There are three children. The eldest is enamoured with Israel the homeland, the daughter is simply enamoured with one of the Israeli agents and the youngest is also enamoured, with his father's business and a Muslim girl. The parents are in conflict. The father considers cosmopolitan Paris as a new home, while the mother is torn between whether she should follow her children or stay at her husband's side.

How these life conflicts contributed to the breakup of so many families is a painful reminder of the past. And how the Piccs broke up in the storm is difficult to watch.

Cohen has illustrated a page of history that many have chosen to forget. Since the Israeli agent's mandate was to bring in as many people as possible and the local Arab population were seen as innocent (read ignorant), Arab hoodlums and well-intentioned but overzealous Jewish youth were recruited for acts of incitement. Jews and their henchmen torched synagogues and stores and framed Arabs in order to instil artificial panic and quickly fill Jewish immigration quotas.

While some will offer vehement denials of the material Cohen presents, he has opted for the entire story warts and all. For this film, along with his other award winning features, Cohen deserves a big Sephardi Chazak ou Baruch!

More on Jewish learning

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at institutions that offer "distance learning courses" on the Internet. Today, a look at some of the free courses offered online – and a peak into some Israeli classrooms.

You won't find a more eclectic mix of subjects than those offered by JUICE, Jewish University in CyberspacE [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/juice/index.html]. Recent courses offered everything from biblical perspectives on child development to the siddur as a window on Jewish theology. JUICE is run by the Department for Jewish Zionist Education. Even if you miss a course, you can browse through the lecture archives and contribute to the discussion forums.

At Jewish Interactive Studies, participants correspond with a Jerusalem-based staff to learn more about a variety of Jewish topics [http://www.jewishstudies.org]. These courses last one to two months and start throughout the year. The Jewish Ethics course: Getting Along with People – and Yourself uses material from Maimonides, Rabbi Yonah and the Talmud.

Also worth a look is Project Genesis which offers online, self-directed courses in Jewish law, women in Judaism, Rambam and a daily Halachah [http://www.torah.org/].

Maqom calls itself a Cyber-School for Adult Talmud Study [http://www.maqom.com]. The Houston-based institution was founded by Rabbi Judith Abrams. You can find even more links and courses at the Jewish Educators' Toolkit [http://www.jesna.org/jeet/distance.htm].

One of my favourite distance learning courses is for children who are hospitalized at the Soroka Medical Centre in Beersheva. They have access to enriched school programs thanks to the efforts of teachers and classmates in the Negev and in Jerusalem [http://www.tilda.edu-negev.gov.il/ilay/school/eng lish/english.htm]. Students from Eshel Ha Nasi Regional School who are hospitalized can continue studying directly with their classes.

The school also produces a weekly radio show devoted to hospitalized children. This program provides a warm connection with friends, school and others, while combining regards and wishes from friends, with songs requested especially for the patient.

But what is it like to participate in a worldwide classroom where you have never met anybody else in your class? Massachusetts-based Hebrew College has posted these comments from one of its students: "When I describe our class to other people I'm sure they think I'm a little crazy to be so entranced by a bunch of people I've never met. I try to visualize all of us typing away at keyboards all over the world, at all times of day, and it's as if I finally understand why spider silk, nearly invisible, is one of the strongest natural fibres. We're spinning line after line on our own, releasing words that are then caught and webbed together in a sticky, translucent net. One edge hooked over Jerusalem, the other stretched over Cambridge… I just wish we could have a huge party where we could guess each other's identity based on one simple hint." [http://hebrewcollege.edu]

Finally, isn't it time for you to get to class? You can take a look at over 10 hours of streaming video from The Academic Channel, a joint effort of University of Haifa and Bar-Ilan University in association with the Hebrew University and the Technion [http://tv.proj.ac.il/ENMENU.HTM]. There is no charge to watch these Hebrew-language videos but you will need to download the MediaBase software plug-in which works with RealVideo [http://acvideo.haifa.ac.il/mbase/]. It's a bit of work to get it going, but when was the last time you had the opportunity to watch lectures on Zionism and post-Zionism, gender and dance, and deciphering the human genome, right on your desktop?

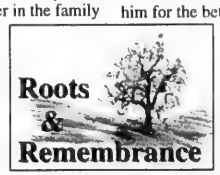
Skeletons in family closet

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Regarding a family matter that produces sadness or shame, people sometimes draw a curtain of silence that may persist until they, along with their painful secret, are buried together in the family crypt. But long afterwards, the genealogist may stumble upon an obscure reference to the episode, and endeavour to learn the whole truth.



The skeleton may have been kept in the closet for fifty, seventy, even one hundred years. Then the curious genealogist will one day wonder whatever happened to great-great uncle Harry, the "black sheep" who stole horses and "was never heard from again." (Chances are, he was heard from, but in a connection that would have set a bad example for the children.)

Dead men usually tell no tales, but old newspapers always do. Recently, while poring over microfilmed Toronto newspapers from the 1890s, I encountered numerous sad and spicy stories about people labelled (and often characterized) as Jews, Jewesses, and Hebrews.

"Too Many Wives" was the particular downfall of Morris Haims, formerly of Toronto, and living at Niagara when he was apprehended for bigamy. The Toronto World of December 5, 1894, relates that Haims came to Montreal from England about 1880 with his wife, whom he deserted. She had been seeking him for the better part of 14 years.

"Haims in his wanderings settled at Rochester and did a peddling business. He wooed and won a pretty Jewess named Lena Cline… They were married and came to Toronto to live, but left last spring for Niagara Falls, N.Y., where Haims has been acting as agent for the American Installment Company."

Evidently, the first Mrs. Haims attained satisfaction after placing an advertisement in the Jewish Gazette describing her missing husband. "A Rochester friend recognized the man on reading it, and, knowing the whereabouts of Haims and wife No. 2, brought about the denouement."

"Death Rather Than Prison" was evidently the choice for Jake Barquis, "42 years old, of Teraulay street, a Russian Jew" (June 8, 1895). Fortunately, his wish was thwarted. Detective McGrath of the city police had come to arrest him on a charge of cheque forgery, and a lady of the house had informed the suspect, who lived upstairs with his wife, that a gentleman wished to see him.

"Barquis apparently knew the visitor to be an officer of the law, as a moment later McGrath was startled by the screams of a woman issuing from Barquis' room. He rushed upstairs and found Barquis had made an effort to cut his own throat with a knife…

"McGrath wrested the knife from his grasp and enclosed his wrists in the bracelets. Dr. Todd was summoned and put several stitches into the wound. The prisoner was then removed to Police Headquarters."

Naturally, Jews in the news are not always rogues; they are also victims, witnesses and innocent bystanders. Nov. 22, 1894: "A delivery wagon belonging to Mr. H. Ruben, baker, of 197 Lippincott street" was sent careening down Yonge Street when a horse took fright and bolted, causing a collision.

Also that month, Samuel Barnett, a tailor with a shop at 154 York street, had hired a "mulatto seamstress" named Clara Ford; when she was charged in a sensational murder, Barnett's name and even a sketch of him was splashed across the papers.

Each of these century-old accounts, if put into the right hands, might make an important addition to a family history. The establishment of a universal index listing such "stray" references would undoubtedly prove of value to the genealogical community.

New kosher food facility opens doors in Thornhill

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As the Jewish community expands northward up Bathurst Street, so do kosher food facilities.

At the recent official ribbon-cutting ceremony at the opening of Bais Burger, a meat restaurant located at 7700 Bathurst St. in the Promenade Village Shops in Thornhill, City of Vaughan's Mayor Lorna Jackson wished the owners, Isaac and Anat Kraus much success in their newest venture.

Bais Burger

"The City of Vaughan," said the mayor, "is the fastest growing municipality in Ontario, not only residentially but commercially and industrially – small businesses are very important and we try to support them."

Bais Burger provided the food for the festivities at the City of Vaughan's Canada Day festivities. The Krauses also provide food for other non-Jewish and Jewish festivals and events throughout the year.

"We are very excited about our new venture at the Promenade," said Isaac. "We provide food for many groups, organizations and schools in this area."

Bais Burger is under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR).

The menu includes a variety of beef and chicken hot dogs and burgers, chicken wings and fingers, falafel, shawarma and a variety of other dishes.

Their crispy coated French fries come in the traditional deep fried version or baked on request. As well, there are vegetarian hot dogs, burgers and other non-meat dishes.

Bais Burger has table seating indoors and out, with lots of parking.

Isaac and Anat came to Canada 14 year ago from Israel where they lived on a non-religious kibbutz. Working as a limousine driver in Toronto, Isaac had a serious accident. While recovering, he became deeply involved in Judaic studies.

Their company, Kosherland Fast Foods, opened the first-ever kosher food concession at Canada's Wonderland when Anat realized that a person who keeps kosher could not bring food into the park.

They moved in a number of directions including catering for many Jewish organizations, special weekly programs at the Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School, United Synagogue Day Schools, and an everyday service at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Susan Kadis, a City of Vaughan councillor, and Joyce Frustaglio, the regional councillor, attended the opening ceremony.

Kadis says she believes Bais Burger will be "a great asset to the community. I know the individuals involved and they are well respected and provide very good products for the community to enjoy at reasonable prices."

Blachman family reunites on Canadian soil

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Etan Garazi, born May 25, a sixth-generation descendent of Boruch and Leah Blachman, was the youngest participant at the recent Blachman family reunion here, the first held in Canada.

Dr. Arvin Weinstein, 81, of Madison, Wis., was the oldest to attend the reunion, the fifth the family has held – the gatherings have taken place every five years. Family members came from across Canada, the United States and England.

"We now have a directory with more than 400 family members of the Boruch and Leah Blachman family," says Joan Gitelman, one of the reunion organizers.

Boruch and Leah (née Prog) were born in Russia, Leah in Slobodoh and Boruch in Dishneh. They had nine children.

Their daughter Ann Blachman Gitelman and her husband Fred were the first to leave Russia, and in 1923, they settled in Trenton, Ont.

Ann's eight siblings went to the United States, where many of them settled in Madison. Rose Aronin, the last surviving child of Leah and Boruch died this spring.

Joan's husband, Ron Gitelman, and his sister Becky Shulman are the surviving children of Ann and Fred. Four generations of their branch of the family worked for more than a year to organize the recent reunion.

The family's motto is "Alles sheyn und klug" – everyone is beautiful and clever. Its coat of arms is the samovar and the balalaika.

The weekend began with a traditional Shabbat dinner where Becky, the matriarch of the Canadian branch, led the family in the Shabbat candlelighting blessings, joined by her brother Ron who shared the podium.

Other participants at the opening dinner included Barb Newman, Freddi Rakow, Bernie Weinstein, and Merle Aronin. The youngest family member at each table performed the blessings over the challah.

Family members were given name tags with a picture of one of the nine second-generation Blachman siblings. They also received a Blachman 2000 T-shirt and special loot bag, along with some Canadian souvenirs, a directory, the family tree and other memorabilia.

Over the weekend, the family participated in a picnic, a presentation of the Blachman Follies, a Sunday brunch and visits to the Symphony of Fire and Mel Lastman Square.

"Some of our activities were planned so cousins of the same age would be together," Joan says. "We Canadian Blachmans were thrilled to have had the opportunity to have our family come to our great city. They loved it here."

After the reunion, many of the guests stayed on to see more of Toronto and some went to cottage country with cousins.

Joan urges others to organize family reunions, because, she says, they are "such a great experience for everyone.

"In order to maintain ongoing contact with our family, we have a monthly newsletter and a Web site at www.blachmanfamily.com. We are already looking forward to the 2005 family reunion," she adds.

Academic brings Jewish studies to U of Waterloo

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Without the tireless efforts of Paul Gerald Socken, the University of Waterloo's Jewish studies program may well have remained little more than a gleam in Brian Hendley's eyes.

Several years ago, Hendley, then the university's dean of arts, saw the film Schindler's List. He was so moved by it that he phoned Socken, president of the local synagogue, Beth Jacob, and chair of the department of French studies.

"He told me he thought that we should establish a Jewish studies program," recalled Socken. "When I spoke of the idea to the president and vice-president of the university, they gave me their most enthusiastic support."

Despite their encouraging words, it was left to Socken to flesh out the idea and raise funds for a chair in Jewish studies.

Socken knew it would be a daunting struggle. "Unfortunately, it was at that time that the government of Ontario cut university budgets 15 percent across the board," he explained. "So there was no possibility of funding for new areas of study. It would be up to me to find the necessary funds."

Indefatigable and enterprising, Socken launched a fund-raising drive. Now, several years on, his dedication and hard work have paid off handsomely. Thanks to the generosity of a number of donors, notably Toronto businessman Joe Lebovic and his brother, the university has raised $1.5 million toward a $2 million endowment for a chair in Jewish studies.

The first chairholder, James Diamond, takes up his position in September with the start of the academic year.

Socken is extremely pleased. "When I came to the University of Waterloo 28 years ago, I never dreamed that something like this would happen. It has been very exciting and rewarding."

Socken, who holds a PhD from the University of Toronto, joined the University of Waterloo after a year of teaching at York University's department of French literature. He and his wife Rochelle, a former teacher, have two daughters, Deborah, a 22-year-old U of T graduate, and Suzanne, a 24-year-old teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Born and raised in Toronto, the son of East European immigrants, Socken, 54, gravitated toward French for personal and professional reasons.

"During the 1960s, when I was in high school and university, bilingualism and biculturalism were strongly promoted," he said. "They were perceived as the wave of the future. Since I already liked literature and languages, having been exposed to Yiddish as a young child, French seemed like a good choice."

Paul Gerald Socken

In 1964, Socken enrolled in a U of T course known as Modern Languages and Literature. He enjoyed it, and graduated with a double major in French and English in 1968.

He decided to do his MA degree at the University of Iowa in Iowa City. "The then-chair of the graduate department of French at the University of Toronto, Eugene Joliat, told me he had spent the best 20 years of his life at the University of Iowa. He said it had an excellent French department, and advised me to apply.

"I was also looking to go away for graduate studies," said Socken.

"I truly enjoyed Iowa," he added. "Joliat was right. Iowa had a first-rate department. But I turned down their offer of a scholarship to do my PhD there. I decided to return to Toronto."

At the U of T, Socken accepted a position as an assistant to the coordinator of a course on Canadian studies. "It was through that experience that I became acquainted with the incredibly rich literature of French Canada. And I was particularly interested in Gabrielle Roy."

Socken has since become one of Canada's foremost authorities on and interpreters of her novels.

Socken's first book, Concordance de Bonheur d'occasion de Gabrielle Roy, is a stylistic and thematic analysis of Roy's novel.

His second book, Myth and Morality in Alexandre Chenevert by Gabrielle Roy, presents two complementary interpretations of that novel.

Broadening his scope in his third book, Patrimoines: La Francophonie en Amerique du nord, Socken and a group of fellow scholars examined the "living tradition" of French culture in Quebec, Acadia, Ontario, western Canada, New England and Louisiana.

In his most recent book, The Myth of the Lost Paradise in the Novels of Jacques Poulin, he analyzed the first seven books of this Quebecois writer.

At the University of Waterloo, Socken said French studies are strong. "French majors can go into law, journalism, teaching, translation and business. Like all humanities, French is less popular than it once was. But not everyone can be, or should be, a computer scientist or even an MBA."

Much to his regret, Canada's official bilingual policy, noble dream though it was, has not worked.

"At the moment, only one province is officially bilingual. No, it's not Quebec or Ontario. It's New Brunswick. I think it's right for all federal services to be available in French across the country and for provincial governments to offer French schools and services where numbers warrant it.

"But realistically, English Canada is English and Quebec is French. There is no reason to despair over that. If Belgium and Switzerland can make a system of distinct regions function, so can Canada."

Waterloo, Bar-Ilan team up in Jewish studies

Launch set for September 19

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

WATERLOO, Ont.— After several years in the works, the University of Waterloo is planning an official launch for its Jewish Studies program Sept. 19.

Six additional Jewish studies courses are now available to Waterloo students, thanks to a recent agreement between the Ontario university and Bar-Ilan University in Ramat-Gan, Israel.

The courses, to be offered through the internet and featuring real-time student-professor interaction, were developed by Bar-Ilan's Virtual Jewish University. They are also available for credit to students at other universities, as long as the individual dean approves.

"The arrangement with the University of Waterloo is unique in that they are going to promote the program as part of their distance learning program," said Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University's national executive director, Jerry Tollinsky.

The six courses offered are: War and Peace in the Bible, Jerusalem Throughout the Ages, the Judean Desert Scrolls, Jewish Holidays, Jewish Family Law and Relationships, and Music in Traditional Jewish Culture and Society. Bar-Ilan faculty instructors include Judaic scholar Daniel Sperber and Dead Sea Scroll expert Hanan Eshel.

"What it does for us," said Paul Socken, chair of the dean's advisory committee on Jewish studies and chair of the department of French studies, "is, it extends by the equivalent of another professor, the number of courses that will be available to students. Six courses is the equivalent of hiring another person. It's a major breakthrough for us."

> Courses to be offered through the Internet

Another significant breakthrough for the Jewish Studies program, earlier this year, was the naming of lawyer Jim Diamond, a specialist on Maimonides and Jewish biblical interpretation during the medieval period, as its first chair and professor of Jewish Studies.

The program, so far, offers only a minor — not a major — in the field. To minor in Jewish studies, a student needs 10 term courses (half-courses).

Along with approved courses offered at the university itself, such as German Literature of the Holocaust, there is an exchange program with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and three courses are offered through York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, using cassette tapes.

There is also a course called The Quest for Meaning in Modern Judaism, based on the 12-part television series, Judaism – A Quest for Meaning, with Elliott Malamet.

The advantage of the Bar-Ilan program, said Socken, is the newer technology.

Students can enrol in the courses, which begin Sept 17, until the fall. They may not know about the courses because the deal was signed after the distance education calendar was printed. Details are available on the Bar-Ilan Web site http://www.bar-ilan.edu, or by calling the University of Waterloo.

Waterloo has over 300 Jewish students listed with its Jewish Students' Association, said Socken. "We know there's a constituency."

He expects the program to attract non-Jewish students as well, as evidenced by a significant number already taking related courses.

"We know this is going to be a big success…We're not just counting on students in the arts faculty. There will also be engineering, mathematics and computer science students who will be looking for electives."

נפלאות הדמוקרטיה הישראלית

המקרה השני הוא בחירת נשיא המדינה. שוב, על פי משאלי העם רצו רוב רובם של הישראלים בפרס כנשיאם. מה עושה הכנסת? בוחרת במשה קצב בגלל שיקולים ואינטרסים רגעיים. מעבר לפער שבין רצון הכנסת והעם, מייצג קצב את ישראל השנייה, את העלייה, את השכבה הבלתי מיוחסת שאין לה קשרים, וזה טוב, אפילו טוב מאוד. ואי אפשר שלא לחשוב על פרס, שהפסיד כל בחירות עד היום. יש לי הרגשה שגם אם יגש לבחירות לועד חורים הוא יפסיד. מעולם לא הבנתי איך אדם מכשר כל כך, שתביא את פריצת הדרך הכי משמעותית לשלום, ושזכה על כך לפרס נובל, אינו מצליח בפוליטיקה המקומית. על האיש חזה המציאו את המשפט "אין נביא בעירו".

plagued by laws of racial discrimination.

The novel brilliantly captures the atmosphere of the times – at the seaside resort of Riccione, one of Ferrara's society matrons reflects the prevailing attitude of the Catholic community's devotion to Il Duce, the newspapers are already waging a defamatory campaign against the Jews, and the narrator finds he cannot bridle his own resentment and a relationship with an old friend is strained.

The most important relationship that Bassani explores, however, is between the narrator and his father. The narrator defines his father as a romantic and a patriot, politically naïve and inexperienced, similar to many other Italian Jews of his generation.

Although the narrator's father feared the possibility of anti-Semitism in Italy, he was a card-bearing member of the Fascist party, as were many of his co-religionists. He accepted the assurances of prominent fellow Jews that the racial laws would never be applied in Italy.

The narrator finds, however, that he cannot share his father's hope and enthusiasm; he attributes the elder's trust and faith in the future to a foolish naïveté. The mere thought fills him with desperation and a sense of solitude.

In the prologue of The Garden of the Finzi-Contini, we learn that upon returning home in 1957 from the Etruscan necropolis at Cerveteri, outside of Rome, the narrator is moved by the sight of the ancient tombs to recall another monumental tomb in the Jewish cemetery of his native Ferrara.

The imposing family tomb of the Finzi-Contini only houses the remains of the son, Alberto, who died in 1942 of a malignant lymphogranuloma. The other family members, Micol, Prof. Ermanno, his wife Signora Olga, and her mother Signora Regina, were deported to Germany in 1943. It is thus, from the very prologue, we learn the tragic fate of the Finzi-Contini family.

The narrator's recollections of the family date as far back as 1924-25, when as a child he first happened to see the family mausoleum. He remembers catching glimpses of the daughter, Micol, under her father's tallit in the synagogue and later, in 1929, when, leaning on the great wall enclosing the garden, she offers her condolences for his failure in mathematics.

It is not until almost 10 years later, however, in 1938 – a few months after the promulgation of the racial laws – that the narrator finally enters the great garden.

The occasion for his invitation to the Finzi-Contini magna domus is bittersweet. The Finzi-Continis, once highly exclusive in their aristocratic seclusion, had opened their home and garden to fellow Jews now excluded from public libraries and tennis clubs.

The bewilderment of the young narrator at the turn of events in Italy is rooted in the conviction that he, his family, their friends and other members of their community, had always been good citizens.

Malnate, a young communist, endeavours to point out to the narrator and Alberto that they are indirectly, partly responsible for the situation because there were so few Jewish anti-Fascists in Italy.

It is this implied Jewish passivity, resignation and suggested complicity with fascism that, at times, have caused violent responses to Bassani's works from fellow members of his community.

Il romanzo di Ferrara is Bassani's journey into the past; a voyage of discovery motivated by a desire to comprehend and to explain. It is a journey, through remembrances and memories – enlightened and illuminated by the gift of hindsight – towards a fundamental awareness of self and others.

Lacking the involuntary aspect of the recollections of Marcel Proust's À la recherche du temps perdu, Bassani's remembering is a voluntary act, a conscious recollection of events and people that will live eternally through the faculty of memory.

Bassani has meticulously undertaken this exploration of past events in order to transmit an important personal history to future generations; the "lest we forget" motif compels us to seek to understand one of history's cruelest and most violent episodes, and strives to ensure that similar atrocities are never repeated.

Dr. Rachele Longo Lavorato is a senior lecturer in the department of Italian at the University of Toronto.

Laurentian shul seized

She said she does not know what use the municipality will make of the property, but it is not for sale at public auction. She was not aware of what had become of the furnishings and other contents of the synagogue.

The property was registered under the names of William Schecter, Joel Sternthal and M. Maron, all once-active members of the congregation, who have since died.

"Several attempts were made by letter… there was no response at all," Desbiens said. Notices were also published in newspapers. "Anyone could have come forward at any stage, but no one did."

When told the three persons under whose names the property was registered were dead, Desbiens did not comment.

The congregation never had religious status and therefore was not exempt from taxation, she said.

Rabbi Myer Schecter, son of William, was not aware of what had happened to the synagogue, or even that taxes were owing, until he was interviewed by The CJN.

"For sure, our family did not get any letter [from Val Morin]," said Rabbi Schecter, who has three brothers who are also rabbis.

"I think they should have done their homework. These letters would have had to have been registered. Who received them? My father's house burned down and that address no longer exists."

Rabbi Schecter said he had not been to the synagogue in about 25 years, but had attended from the time the first synagogue was built in the '30s. His father was president in the 1950s, he added.

Norman Sternthal, son of Joel, said he had not been contacted by Val Morin about any tax problem either, and had only heard a few days earlier second-hand that the synagogue had been seized.

Rabbi Schecter said he would seek a legal opinion about the situation.

"I feel very saddened, very badly, about what has happened, when I think of what a vibrant community Val Morin used to be," he said.

Sternthal, who attended the synagogue as child, was also saddened. "Why did the synagogue have to pay taxes? Why was it not registered the proper way? Who were the notices served upon? It seems this has happened by default."

Neither Rabbi Schecter nor Sternthal appeared aware that the property was still registered in their late fathers' names.

The land the synagogue is on was donated by the Witkoff family, Rabbi Schecter recalled, and the money for construction came primarily from the Sternthals, Millers, Schecters and Marons. (The M. Maron on the tax roll is believed to be the late Moishe Maron, one of the founders.)

The original synagogue was burned by arson during World War II, probably in 1942, said Rabbi Schecter. Its walls were daubed with swastikas.

A new synagogue, the one standing today, was built soon after that on the same site. It looks much like an old-fashioned cottage with its whitewashed walls and peaked roof. It seats about 100.

It appears to be true that the congregation never was tax-exempt, Rabbi Schecter said. He recalls his father paying a bill each year.

Val Morin, 45 minutes north of Montreal, was a popular summer destination for the Jewish community for decades. The synagogue was often used right up to and including the High Holy Days.

In more recent years, the synagogue was primarily used by the Lubavitch community.

Women make a huge difference

Although it is tempting to tar all politicians with the same brush, intuitively we recognize that there are substantial differences between "types" of politicians.

There is one phenomenon called "women politicians" that has changed the face of parliament. Even a political neophyte, observing question period for the first time, notices that women do politics differently. Nowhere is this more evident than in the Senate.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien may be criticized for juicing the male-female ratio in the upper chamber by filling it with women nearing the mandatory retirement age of 75. But most Hill watchers will quickly acknowledge that the new women have made a huge, positive difference in the relevance and level of engagement the Senate now has in the development of public policy.

Leaving aside individuals like Sharon Carstairs who, while effective, arrived in the Senate via the partisan route, the ranks of the Senate have been graced by thoughtful and committed Canadian women who truly want to help make a difference.

Raynell Andrechuk is a good example. Her resume is coloured with diplomatic postings to Africa, Europe and Geneva (as ambassador to the UNHCR); and she served as a respected judge in her native Saskatchewan. Although appointed by the Tories (remember them?), she is widely regarded as non-partisan. Her work in the Senate on the issues of development and international relations has been exceedingly well received by all stakeholders.

She is not alone. Senators like Ermine Cohen of New Brunswick, Mira Spivak of Manitoba, Landon Pearson and Lorna Milne of Ontario have brought a dynamism to the Senate that has been absent for a long time.

The most significant impact they have had, however, relates to their colleagues of the male persuasion. Their energy has encouraged (or embarrassed) the male senators to adopt a more energetic approach to the business of the Senate.

It has even led some male senators to question government initiatives in a less-than-partisan way. That in turn has facilitated a general spirit of truly sober second thought in the Red Chamber and that, dear readers, has benefited all Canadians.

Winnipeg synagogue goes Hollywood with new cantor

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Shaarey Zedek Synagogue has looked to Hollywood, you might say, to recruit a cantor for yom tov this year.

Gracing the bimah of Winnipeg's largest synagogue this Rosh Hashanah will be Allan Blye, singer, television producer and movie maker.

Originally from Winnipeg, Blye left here in the 1950s to pursue a successful career in show business. But Blye never lost fond feelings for his hometown. He has been back frequently over the years to visit and help in fund-raising events. He even wrote a song about Winnipeg for his St. John's High School 75th anniversary reunion in the mid-1980s.

"We have been trying to hire a full or part-time chazzan for some time," says Jackie Wassermann, the Shaarey Zedek's executive director.

"Allan Blye's name came up several times. Perry Shulman, our vice-president, and Ted Lyons, our president, did some negotiating with him and he agreed to serve as our chazzan for yom tov." Wasserman added that "people are very excited about this."

Wassermann notes that Blye has gained cantorial experience working with Sheila Roitenberg, the synagogue's interim choir director, in Palm Springs where many older members of Winnipeg's Jewish community spend their winters.

It probably helped the Shaarey Zedek's recruitment effort that Blye is moving back to the city of his youth – at least on a part-time basis.

In June, he and his brother and partner, Garry, announced they were creating a new movie production company, with the help of a local investment fund, to make 12 films here over the next three or four years.

Israel's president wants 'quieter, calmer' country

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic AGency

JERUSALEM — Israel's new president has vowed to pursue tolerance and national unity.

Moshe Katsav promised he was "locking up" his conservative political views during his single, seven-year term, saying he would instead focus on the internal problems confronting Israeli society, after being elected Israel's eighth president.

In a secret parliamentary vote, Katsav beat the odds-on favourite, Nobel Peace Prize laureate and former Labour Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

Katsav, 55, is the first Likud candidate to be elected Israel's head of state.

At the swearing-in ceremony, Katsav, who is religiously observant, offered a prayer seeking guidance.

"I ask you, God of Israel, to make me succeed in my role," Katsav said.

"I will do everything to justify your trust in me, and I accept my duty with humility."

The new president also noted his own humble beginnings as a child who immigrated with his family to Israel from Iran.

Katsav spent his first few years in Israel in the transit camps set up for the absorption of Jews who immigrated from mainly Arab countries during the 1950s.

Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg hailed Katsav's election as proof that anyone, from any means or background, could attain the position of "Israel's No. 1 citizen."

Burg also advised Katsav to rise above the political debate.

Katsav's promise to help nurture a "quieter, calmer" Israel contrasted with the more turbulent dynamic that characterized the presidency of his predecessor, Ezer Weizman.

Weizman stepped down three years before his second five-year term was to end after police investigated his financial affairs. Although the police recommended that he not be charged, the investigation gave him a less-than-blemish-free verdict.

A veteran public figure who held key posts in the military and politics before becoming president, Weizman served as president during a period that spanned both left- and right-wing governments.

The outspoken Weizman – the nephew of Israel's first president, Chaim Weizmann – has frequently been a counterbalance to government policy, pushing for progress when the peace process faltered and urging a slowdown during waves of terrorist attacks.

In an emotional speech at Katsav's swearing-in ceremony, Weizman made an appeal to the politically divided Knesset not to abandon the pursuit of peace, "no matter how complicated or difficult it may be."

Peres absent from ceremony

Weizman advised, Katsav, "try not to get into trouble. It's not easy, but perhaps you were elected because your nature is different from mine."

Notably absent from the ceremony was Peres.

Considered the popular favourite for the post, Peres was openly stunned following his defeat.

In an Israel Radio interview on Tuesday, Peres acknowledged disappointment, but said he "blamed no one" for it.

Peres, who remained on as regional development minister in the cabinet of Prime Minister Ehud Barak, said he preferred not to dwell in the past, but to look forward to the future.

Peres' defeat was widely seen as a political slap in the face to Barak, who is struggling to hold on to power in the face of an opposition onslaught against his peace policies.

Peres said Barak must spend the next three months, as the Knesset goes into a summer recess, to try to save his government and the peace process.

"Three months is a very short period of time, and if I can contribute even one ounce of support to the peace process, in my eyes it is 1,000 times more important than being bitter or looking for the guilty," said Peres, an architect of the Oslo accords.

"I see this as the moment of truth for the country."

Barak remains calm as his problems mount

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Prime Minister Ehud Barak exuded his usual confidence in the Knesset last week, but even members of his own party are starting to wonder why.

In rapid succession, the premier saw his nominee for the nation's presidency lose out to a relative unknown, had his foreign minister resign in a public dispute over Barak's handling of the Camp David summit, and the Knesset gave preliminary approval to a bill to dissolve itself and hold early elections.

Analysis

Barak could draw some solace that the Knesset was unable to muster the 61 votes to pass a no-confidence motion against him earlier this week.

But his opponents – and even some members of his coalition – are saying it is only a matter of time until Barak's government falls.

The political clock began ticking for Barak with the start of a Knesset summer recess granting the beleaguered premier three months to try to get his governing coalition in order, and make headway in peace talks with the Palestinians.

It got off to a discouraging start when David Levy resigned as foreign minister – a move that left Barak with only 13 ministers in his cabinet. Two months ago, there were 23.

Just hours after Levy's resignation, the Knesset backed the bill dissolving itself. Given the recess, no further moves on the bill are expected until October or, more likely, November. It must still pass three more votes before it becomes law and new elections are called.

Barak dismissed the vote."I do not yet see the Knesset really dispersing itself and going to elections," he said. "In a few weeks, the dust will settle."

Barak plans to spend that time rebuilding his coalition, which began splintering on the eve of the Camp David summit, when three coalition members – Shas, Yisrael Ba'Aliyah and the National Religious Party – bolted from his government.

But members of his government believe that Barak's options are limited. Even Haim Ramon, who is among the ministers closest to Barak, said the premier is running out of combinations for a workable government.

Earlier in the week, legislators elected Likud Party lawmaker Moshe Katsav president, in a vote that was believed to be as much a stinging rebuke to Barak as it was to Katsav's opponent, former Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

Peres did not link the fate handed him during the secret Knesset ballot to the standing of Barak and his government among Israel's legislators.

Nor did he deduce that his own defeat means that Barak would not triumph in a national referendum on a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

Peres' old friend and political foe, Ariel Sharon, however, did link the defeat to the peace process.

Sharon, leader of the opposition Likud Party, claimed the majority that put Katsav into the president's residence is, in effect, the same majority in the Knesset that opposes Barak's peace moves.

This majority includes the rightist bloc and the religious bloc. It is the coalition that former Prime Minister Menachem Begin first put together in 1977, when he brought his Likud Party to power for the first time.

His successor, Yitzhak Shamir, inherited the coalition and was able to preserve it for much of the following decade.

Former Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin overturned the coalition, briefly but crucially, after the election of 1992, when he wooed the Shas Party into his Labour-Meretz government and went on to sign the Oslo Accords with the Palestinians.

The rightist-religious coalition came together again four years later, to support Benjamin Netanyahu for the premiership.

Barak did succeed in creating Rabin's coalition when he won power last year, but he has not succeeded in holding it together.

The fortunes of Barak's peace initiative, which still hangs in the balance despite the collapse of the Camp David summit, is the stuff of Israel's future.

The ever-confident Barak – and with him the defeated but not silenced Peres – believe there is still room to hope that the Palestinians will accept U.S. bridging proposals on Jerusalem, and that if they do, the people of Israel will do so as well.

Barak has the opinion polls to back him up. A recent Gallup poll indicated that 66 percent of Israelis favour further negotiations with the Palestinians.

On the political right, people point to the huge disparity between the weekend opinion polls regarding the presidency and what in fact transpired in the Knesset presidential vote. The polls showed Peres favoured by three times as many Israelis as Katsav. Yet Katsav won.

Perhaps, some argue, the polls are also way off when it comes to the negotiations with the Palestinians.

Pollsters and left-of-centre pundits, though, maintain that the "inaccuracy"of the polls in terms of who would win the presidential contest proves that the Knesset is way to the right of the public.

In the aftermath of the dramatic presidential vote, Sharon's vaunted national camp majority failed to gel in a no-confidence motion against Barak. Only 50 members supported the motion, which needed 61 of the Knesset's 120 members to bring the premier and his government down.

But Sharon vowed that the summer recess would give Barak no peace.

Political observers say the crunch will come when the Knesset returns from its summer break, just after the High Holidays.

If Barak has gotten an accord with the Palestinians by then, there will be elections.

If he has not, they say, there will still be elections.

The only question is when they will be held. Some politicians suggest the spring of 2001. Others say Barak will be unable to govern until then, that he will be unable to push through the state budget at year's end.

Either way, the present government's days seem numbered. Pundits may long debate whether Peres' defeat was related to this situation, but all are agreed that the same Knesset that denied him the presidency is fast approaching the end of its term.

Renowned chassidic leader dies

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Mourners are remembering the longtime rebbe of the Bobover chassidic group as an exceptional leader – one who rebuilt a community from the ashes of the Holocaust.

Rabbi Shlomo Halberstam died last week at a hospital in the Borough Park section of Brooklyn, the heavily Jewish neighborhood where the Bobovers are based and where he had built a world-renowned synagogue and yeshiva.

Rabbi Halberstam, 92, was believed to have been the last remaining chassidic rabbi to have survived the Holocaust. Born in Galicia, Rabbi Halberstam arrived in the United States in 1946, indigent after his group was largely obliterated by the Nazis.

Obituary

During World War II, Rabbi Halberstam dressed as a nun in order to rescue Jews, hiding them in a coal truck. His wife and several children were killed in the Holocaust.

Rabbi Naftali Halberstam, now 70, was the only child to survive the war and he will replace his father as rebbe.

Rabbi Halberstam, who subsequently remarried and had more children, is widely credited with rebuilding the Bobover community in the United States.

When he arrived in New York, there were so few haredi Jews in his Manhattan neighbourhood that his son recalled being sent out into the street to look for a minyan. He was known to greet newly arrived Holocaust survivors as their boats docked on the piers.

Later, he moved his community to Brooklyn.

"People needed a leader, someone who could help them restore their faith and optimism. He did that," said Abraham Biederman, an activist in the Borough Park community and a friend of the rebbe.

"He was energetic and had a regal bearing and extraordinary sense of class, but at the same time extraordinary warmth," added Biederman. "People really loved him."

Yitzhak, a Bobover Jew living in Borough Park who did not want his last name used, said Rabbi Halberstam was "open to everyone – there was no such thing as a closed door."

Yitzhak, who studied for his bar mitzvah under the rebbe's tutelage 40 years ago, described Rabbi Halberstam's death as "a loss for the Jewish people."

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, got to know Rabbi Halberstam in the 1970s, while heading the Jewish Community Relations Council of Greater New York.

"He eschewed extremism," said Hoenlein. "To be in his presence you sensed not only his charisma but his nobility and his saintliness. He literally knew every single child in his yeshiva, and it has thousands of children."

An estimated 20,000 Bobover Jews live in Borough Park, and there are smaller communities in Monsey, N.Y., Montreal, Toronto, Mexico City, Great Britain and Israel. Most Bobover Jews do not descend from the group's prewar Polish community, but were drawn to the sect through the rebbe's leadership.

Vatican calls for international status for Jerusalem's holy sites

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The Vatican's foreign minister has informed visiting U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright that an international status for Jerusalem's holy sites is a prerequisite for a "just and lasting" Middle East peace.

A Vatican spokesman said Archbishop Jean-Louis Tauran stressed to Albright "the priority of dialogue; respect for international decisions, particularly UN resolutions; and the necessity of a special, internationally guaranteed status for the holy places of the three monotheistic religions."

The Vatican, which sees itself as the protector of Christian interests in Jerusalem and at other Holy Land sites, has long sought to be an active player in Middle East peace negotiations.

Albright stopped off in Rome on her way home from Asia to brief Tauran on last month's failed talks at Camp David between Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

At a news conference following talks with Italian Foreign Minister Lamberto Dini, Albright said that at Camp David, Arafat had not shown an interest in the internationalization of Jerusalem and had insisted on full Palestinian sovereignty over eastern Jerusalem.

Early elections favoured

Livnat said during the plenum discussion that "Barak has been left with a head but without a government, while we have been left without a budget, education, health, agriculture, infrastructure or peace between ourselves, let alone with our neighbours."

Lieberman chose to attack the Arab parties. "All you do is subvert the operations of the State of Israel," he said. "All you want is to destroy and raze the state. You are the Knesset's angels of destruction. If you want to be Palestinians, go to Palestine! I'll pay for your one-way ticket."

This prompted the Arab MKs to respond in a similar manner. Mohammed Barakeh, Issam Makhoul and Ahmed Tibi jumped to their feet and shouted, "Fascist, bully, cheek. Get out of here!"

Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg was forced to expel Barakeh from the plenum because of the fracas that ensued.

Justice Minister Yossi Beilin responded to the bills on behalf of the government. He said the Knesset did not really want to disband because if it did, it could have done so on Monday when a no-confidence motion was discussed. If the opposition had managed to muster 61 MKs on Monday, elections would have to be held within 90 days, Beilin added. He said the opposition did not want new elections.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak commented after the vote that he was not especially moved by the result. He said the country is further from elections than it seems in the Knesset. When the dust settles, there will be a government, the prime minister concluded.

German university reconstructs shuls on the Web

DARMSTADT, Germany — Synagogues in Germany destroyed by Adolf Hitler's hordes have been brought back to life through the wonders of computer technology.

In a remarkable and unprecedented achievement, architects at the Technical University here have reconstructed "virtual synagogues" sacked and burned by the Nazis between June and November 1938.

"We were the first in Germany to come up with this project," said Marc Grellert, a 36-year-old professor of architecture who initiated it after the 1994 firebombing of a synagogue in the northern German city of Lubeck.

"We went into this not knowing anything about synagogues," acknowledged Manfred Koob, chair of the faculty of architecture. "My generation knew nothing about Jewish culture."

Koob, 51, added: "The idea was to show that it is not foreign to Germany."

Since then, the Technical University has produced a Web site and a documentary film displaying three-dimensional images of the shuls. The Internet address is http://www.cad.architektur.tu-darmstadt.de.

On May 17, an exhibit on the project was launched in Bonn at the Art and Exhibition Hall of the Federal Republic of Germany, Synagogues in Germany: A Virtual Reconstruction. It ran until July 16.

Under the guidance of Koob, the project commenced with the digital rebuilding of three synagogues in Frankfurt erected in 1860, 1881 and 1907 in the Judengasse, the Bornplatz and the Friedberger Anlange. They were razed on Nov. 9 and 10, during Kristallnacht.

The cyber team, composed of seven students as well as Grellert and Koob, is currently reconstructing the Glockengasse synagogue in Cologne (1861), the Senefelderstrasse/Ecke Engelstrasse synagogue in Plauen (1930), the Bergstrasse synagogue in Hannover (1870), the Herzog-Maxstrasse synagogue in Munich (1887), and the Fasanenstrasse synagogue in Berlin (1912).

With the sole exception of the Munich shul, which was pillaged on June 9, these synagogues were set alight on Kristallnacht.

Grellert and Koob are still working on the interiors of the Luisenstrasse synagogue in Kaiserslautern (1886), the Hans Sachs Platz synagogue in Nürnberg (1874), the Gottschedstrasse/Ecke Zentralstrasse synagogue in Leipzig (1855), the Zeughausstrasse synagogue in Dresden (1840), and the Hiltropwall synagogue in Dortmund (1900).

The first two were demolished in August, while those in Leipzig and Dresden were ravaged in November. The temple in Dortmund was smashed in October.

According to Grellert, they were designed in a variety of styles, ranging from Moorish in Kaiserslautern and German Romanesque in Munich to neo-classical in Berlin and Bauhaus in Plauen.

They were grand buildings, reflecting the self-confidence of the Jewish community in the second half of the 19th century and the first third of the 20th century.

Geometrically, the reconstructions are almost completely accurate, true to architectural nuances and colours.

"The objective is to convey an impression of what was lost, not an exact facsimile," explained Grellert. "I was interested not only in creating beautiful images, but in generating an interest in Jewish culture. So it's a political project. I knew very little about Jewish history in Germany when I began."

Koob, who had never met a Jew before coming on board, said that his students were animated by "a special responsibility for German history."

As he put it: "They understand what was destroyed. The point was to recreate a consciousness of what was lost."

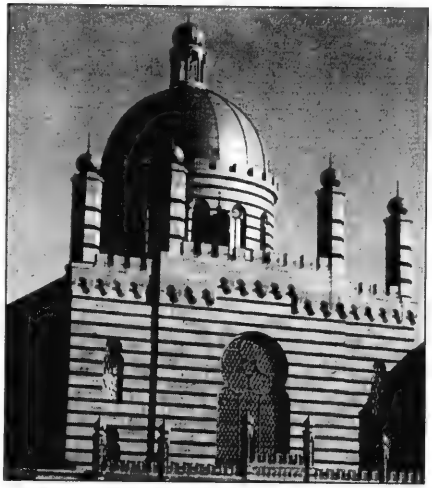
To prepare themselves for the task, Grellert and Koob enlisted the aid of local Jewish communities. They scoured archives for blueprints, photographs and illustrations. They also talked with Jews who had worshipped at these synagogues.

Grellert and Koob are still searching for eyewitnesses who can assist them with the reconstruction of synagogue interiors and colouring in Kaiserslautern, Nurnberg, Leipzig, Dresden and Dortmund.

They received financial assistance from the federal government and municipalities, but banks and companies rejected their overtures.

Out of a feeling of "historical responsibility," they did not solicit funds from the Jewish community.

Grellert, whose late grandfather belonged to the Nazi party, was a graduate student when he approached Koob. "After the firebombing in Lubeck, I wanted to raise a protest against racism and anti-Semitism, and to pay tribute to the architectural importance of the synagogues. I was basically interested in the connections between architecture, society and minorities."



The Glockengasse synagogue in Cologne, as reconstructed by the Technical University.

Grellert, who had digitally reconstructed a Bauhaus building in Germany and a pre-French Revolution church in France, consulted Koob because of his expertise in rebuilding historic structures using the computer.

"When he came to me, anti-Semitism was on the rise in Germany," said Koob. "Jews supported our project wholeheartedly, though I was not sure that this would be the case."

Grellert and Koob have no plans at present to reconstruct more synagogues, but believe that their project may inspire additional schools of architecture in Germany to emulate their example. In the meantime, they hope that Synagogues in Germany will travel to other museums in Germany and abroad, particularly Israel.

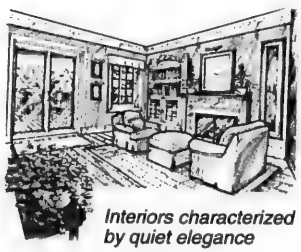
Quietly nestled in the abundant greenery just north of Dempsey Park — a stone's throw from Mel Lastman Square and the subway — the exclusive Residences of Dempsey Park offer the best of old and new.

Inspired by North York heritage houses like the Dempsey House — around which the Park unfolds — the Residences unite architectural tradition with innovation and convenience. Built by the finest tradespeople, and using the best materials available, they promise to become the heritage homes of the future.

The builder, Freed Developments, has earned an enviable reputation from a variety of projects ranging from the Summerhill Garden Centre to the refurbishing of Pusateri's Fine Foods.

Uniting architectural tradition with innovation and convenience — and abundant greenery



Interiors characterized by quiet elegance

Builder Peter Freed describes the Residences as "North York's largest luxury in-fill development west of Yonge Street."

The Residences are spacious three-storey freehold condominiums of solid brick, and have two-car parking. Lower-level options of apartment, office or recreation room are available; and upper storey plans can be reversed according to the desired location of the master bedroom.

There are only 49 units in five distinctive models: the Simcoe, Gibson, Cartier, Mackenzie, and Dempsey. Prices range from $379,900 for the 1,800-sq. ft. Simcoe House to $489,900 for the Georgian-inspired Dempsey House, with 3,037 sq. ft.

Variety is integral to the Residences' design. The two blocks facing Dempsey Park have stone facades; the next two are extensively landscaped with privacy fencing; and the deep backyards of the three northernmost blocks are set among mature trees.

Every Residence has central air conditioning, a nine-foot main-floor ceiling, plaster cornice mouldings, gas fireplace, ceramic tiles, upgraded kitchen cabinets, and luxurious master ensuite. Workmanship and materials are guaranteed for one year, utility systems for two. Major structural integrity is guaranteed for a full seven years.

You may benefit from low interest rates with Scotiabank, and move in by spring / summer 2001. Every pre-construction buyer will enjoy strip oak hardwood floors for living-dining room or great room; and for a limited time, very early purchasers will also receive granite kitchen countertops.

Sales centre hours are Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m.; Monday to Thursday, 1 p.m. to 8 p.m.; and Friday by appointment. Model viewings can be arranged by calling (416) 733-2101.

With its compelling combination of architectural heritage, modern amenities, ultraconvenient urban location and ruralistic greenery, it's not surprising that the Residences of Dempsey Park project is approaching 50% sold out after its first ten weeks on the market.

Stockholm's Great Synagogue is a tourist magnet

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

STOCKHOLM — Stockholm is one of the most beautiful cities in the world, or so I had been told by a high school friend of mine who now lives there.

The city's urban parklands, harbour views and Old City – a colourful cluster of shops, old buildings and narrow alleys known as Gamla Stan – confirmed that opinion for me.

We had lunch with Swedish relatives in Stockholm's Rosendal Gardens – an idyllic park with an upscale cafeteria housed in a large tent – taking our trays to a nearby picnic table.

The city is built on 14 islands, and is easy to navigate on public transit.

Rabbi Philip Spectre

Not far from the Rosendal Gardens, also in a park setting, is the Vasa Museum, a popular attraction featuring a restored 17th-century warship.

Other sites worth visiting include Drottningholm Palace, the residence of Sweden's royal family with its 18th-century theatre; Skansen, an "open-air museum" along the lines of Toronto's Pioneer Village; and Stockholm's 77-year-old City Hall, site of the annual December Nobel banquets. (The actual prize ceremony takes place in Stockholm's downtown concert hall.)

Attention to detail in the design of City Hall is evident: We were told by a guide that before the staircases were constructed, the architect built wooden models for his wife to test, to ensure that women's evening gowns would "sweep" the stairs as they descended.

For Jewish visitors, Stockholm's Great Synagogue, an elegantly imposing structure with a rose-window overlooking its Assyrian-influenced sanctuary, is a magnet. The city's main synagogue, it is located on Wahrendorffsgatan, a 15-minute walk from Gamla Stan. Tours are available by appointment.

A denominational hybrid, the Great Synagogue is designed in traditional Orthodox style with an upstairs balcony for women. Downstairs, however, the seating is split, with men on one side, and mixed seating on the other. Originally a Reform congregation, it is now affiliated with the Conservative movement.

Reflecting the congregation's Reform roots is an organ, played by a non-Jewish musician on Friday nights, Shabbat mornings and major holidays.

The Great Synagogue is one of three congregations in Stockholm. The other two are Orthodox, presided over by Rabbi Meir Hordin, who divides his time between them. Adas Jeshurun, located in the Hillel Day School, is a prewar German synagogue smuggled from Hamburg and rebuilt in Stockholm.

Unlike their counterparts in North America, Stockholm Jews pay membership fees to the Jewish community, which supports the individual synagogues and about 100 Jewish organizations.

This community structure was part of Stockholm's appeal for Rabbi Philip Spectre, the Great Synagogue's spiritual leader since 1998, and his wife Barbara, founder and director of the fledgling Paideia, the European Institute of Jewish Studies and Culture, which will be located in Stockholm.

A native of Buffalo, N.Y., Rabbi Spectre headed the Masorti (Conservative) movement in Israel for 15 years before his move to Sweden.

"[In Stockholm,] we work with the Orthodox community hand in hand," he said. "We try to create harmony. This is what I had hoped and prayed would be in Israel."

Outside the Great Synagogue is a menorah – a gift of the Swedish government dedicated by the king – and a two-year-old memorial wall, commemorating 200,000 relatives of Swedes who perished in the Holocaust. The wall, along a narrow alley, was designed to make visitors feel they are in a ghetto.

We also visited one of the city's two Jewish cemeteries still in use (two others are historical sites). Not far from the renowned Karolinska Institute, the cemetery dates back almost a century, housing the graves of well-known German Jewish settlers, among them artists, authors, and businesspeople whose distinctive headstones are shaded by rows of stately lindens and birch trees.

Stockholm is home to roughly half of Sweden's Jewish population of 18,000, we were told by University of Stockholm student Rachel Baran, a guide at Stockholm's Jewish Museum.

The second-floor museum, small and charming, has a permanent exhibit including a Holocaust corner that pays tribute to Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg and outlines Sweden's role is saving Norwegian and Danish Jews during the war.

Exciting side-trips from Stockholm

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

STOCKHOLM — With Stockholm as home base, it's possible to take easy side-trips or more ambitious ones.

Only 49 kilometres from Stockholm is Sigtuna with its 11th-century rune stones, 12th-century church ruins and a town hall that was rebuilt in the 1700s. Its name signifies its one-time claim to fame as home of the Viking chief.

Nearby Uppsala is Sweden's oldest university town, which also features a medieval castle. It's easy to see both towns in a day.

If you can afford more time, Helsinki is 14 hours away by boat. We took an overnight cruise there and back, spending a day in Finland's capital.

Leaving Stockholm, we watched the 24,000 islands of its archipelago and saw a magnificent late-night sunset over the Baltic – although in early summer, the night never turns completely dark in those northerly latitudes.

Finland gained independence in 1917 after 108 years as a Russian duchy, a heritage still evident in some of its architecture. Prior to 1809 it was under Swedish rule.

To make the most of our time, we took a morning bus tour, getting a taste of city highlights like the memorial to composer Jean Sibelius in Vinamanen Park and the 30-year-old (Lutheran) Church in the Rock, blasted into granite.

We bypassed the two-year-old Riasma Museum of Modern Art, with its distinctive, angular-looking aluminum and glass exterior, to browse the seaside open-air market under a sunny summer sky and then make our way on foot to the synagogue.

The 1906 synagogue boasts a 569-seat sanctuary, its balcony supported by white and gold painted columns. It also houses an 80-year-old day school (kindergarten to Grade 8) and an old age home. The congregation is served by a part-time rabbi.

Helsinki has a Jewish community of about 1,000 people and dates back 150 years, we were told by Leib Lindholm, the affable gatekeeper who led us through the synagogue, even though we arrived well after its weekday 9:30 a.m. to 11 a.m. opening hours.

Lawyer's book deals with legal issues related to art collecting

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Suppose you find a rare lithograph by an important European artist for sale in a neighbourhood antique shop at a price that seems a steal. If you purchase the work, what legal and moral consequences fall upon you if it is later identified as one that the Nazis plundered from a Jewish family during the war?

This is one of many legal issues related to art collecting that Toronto arts lawyer and art collector Aaron Milrad addresses in Artful Own-ership, a new authoritative tome on art law, valuation and commerce in Canada, the United States and Mexico.

A 340-page hardcover book, Artful Ownership is the first comprehensive legal guide to the buying, selling, donating and appraisal of art works, antiques and collectibles in North America. It is published by the American Society of Appraisers (ASA), based in Washington, D.C.

Milrad, who has been practising law for nearly 40 years, notes that while the process of appraising machinery, real estate or corporations seems well defined and well understood, art appraisal is generally perceived as a much more arcane process, with fewer guiding principles.

"The subjective nature of art, the variety of styles, conditions, methods and materials, and the rarity and unknown provenance of many collectibles and precious objects often make the appraisal process seem more like an art than a rational business process," he says.

Serious art collectors, he asserts, need a thorough and up-to-date legal guidebook to help them with varied issues related to appraisal, buying at auctions, copyright, forgery, insurance, taxation and war booty, such as Nazi-confiscated art.

Artful Ownership outlines the recent developments that affect such plundered art. The book outlines, for example, the principles reached by a group of 44 nations and 13 non-governmental organizations that met at the Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets in 1998. It also outlines the guidelines developed by the Association of Art Museum Directors in regard to the often-thorny issue of restitution.

Artful Ownership also addresses how divorce affects a joint collection, how copyright affects one's right to reproduce artwork, and the correct procedure to donate a collectible to a museum. It contains many intriguing historical stories from the world of lost, stolen, disputed and mislaid treasures, and even delves into underwater sea tombs to discover secrets and rules governing shipwrecks and salvaged hoards.

For decades, many people have sought out Milrad's legal counsel. A member of Fraser Milner, a national law firm headquartered in Toronto, he is also a noted collector of contemporary painting, sculpture and ceramics. He sits or has sat on the boards of many arts institutions, including the Art Gallery of Ontario and the Tel Aviv Museum.

The book is available through the ASA Web site, www.appraiser.org, or call 800-272-8258.

Film guide compiles a list of close to 400 Jewish movies

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Interested in collecting Jewish films but have no idea where to go after Fiddler on the Roof and Yentl? Larry Anklewicz's Guide to Jewish Films on Video (KTAV Publishing House) may be of help.

Anklewicz, an occasional contributor to these pages, has compiled a list of around 400 films – mainly feature length movies, made-for-television films and television mini-series.

But what makes a film Jewish is a contentious issue. The Guide includes an essay by Anklewicz on the topic, adding a lot of credibility to the book.

Anklewicz immediately dismisses any film that has Jewish actors, producers or directors, "otherwise most Hollywood films would be Jewish."

Instead, he looks at either the storyline or the characters.

Any film about the Holocaust, Israel or anti-Semitism would be Jewish. But Jerusalem, about a group of Swedish Christians moving to Jerusalem in the heat of religious fervor, is not a Jewish film.

Any film with a strong Jewish character is included in this guide. Independence Day is included because of Jeff Goldblum's character David Levinson, whose father gives him a Jewish prayer book and yarmulke to take on a dangerous mission.

Sometimes determining whether a film is Jewish or not is "highly sensitive." Anklewicz calls the '80s teen-flick Dirty Dancing "very Jewish, but others would never notice the Jewish connotations hidden beneath the surface. Everyone is free to decide."

In the description of Dirty Dancing, Anklewicz say, "the film does not make this very explicit, but the fact is that Baby (the female character) is Jewish and Johnny (the male lead) is not." That's why, he believes, Johnny's parents were opposed to his affair with Baby.

Insights like this make this book stand apart from other Jewish film guides.

What is missing, though, is a rating system that most of us have come to expect in video guides.

The book's index classifies the films by actors, alphabetical order, chronologically, by directors, genres, languages and distributors. It is definitely a must for fans of Jewish films.

Anklewicz's essay also examines the history of Jewish cinema and it discusses the effect videos have had on the movie business.

If you can't find it in bookstores, you can order it online from Chapters and Indigo.

In the business of making people laugh

By KATHYRN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — By day, Lowell Schrieder, 25, is the publicity co-ordinator at the Comedy Network, but by night he's an up and coming comedian on the alternative comedy circuit.

Schrieder wants to be a success both in front of an audience and behind the scenes. His goal is to produce and perform sketch comedy with an edge, that will transcend alternative stages and be accepted at mainstream clubs.

At the same time, he continues to work at the business of comedy, having spent almost three years at the Comedy Network promoting the careers of such Canadian comedians as Mike Bullard, Colin Mochrie (Whose Line Is It Anyways?) and Tom Green, now the comic force for the MTV generation.

"It has been a great experience to work at a speciality channel and help it grow to the point where local comedians through our network have gained a cult following and turned into international personalities," Schrieder says.

"However, I do feel a sort of discrepancy because on one hand I love to do comedy and I'd like to be like all those comedians, who I'm promoting. On the other hand, I love the comedy business. I work in such an exciting atmosphere.

"The bottom line is comedy is a very serious business and we work tremendously hard to promote Canadian comedians. In our office, there is not as much laughter as you would think."

The job of promoting comics can be stressful. One day Schrieder was delegated to escort former wrestler Maurice "Mad Dog" Vachon on a media tour. While driving, Schrieder got lost and although he was extremely nervous, he tried not to show it. Until he found his way, 45 minutes later, Schrieder faked composure and entertained his passenger with small talk.

As for his comedy career, Schrieder began performing sketch comedy only a year ago, although he tells us he began entertaining as an infant – performing Muppet imitations for his parents' friends from his crib in North York.

He never formally studied the art of comedy, but gained confidence on the microphone with enthusiastic readings of announcements over the PA system at York Mills Collegiate Institute.

He gained work experience on staff at the B'nai Brith Youth Organization. His position focused on helping and guiding young members.

"I was in charge of all the male chapters of the Aleph Zadik Aleph in the Lake Ontario Region," he states. "This job allowed me to hone my skills at personal communications in a non-threatening environment. It was a place that let me be myself and teach the kids by including humour and fun. That experience helped me get the job at the Comedy Network."

The comedian has dreams of producing and performing on his own Comedy Network show.

He has already appeared on camera. When the folks producing the show Canadian Comedy Shorts needed to tape the series introduction, they turned to Schrieder to mime an incompetent usher. The show is slated to run for five years, so Schrieder's one time performance will be aired over and over.

Schrieder is in the process of writing and producing a new sketch comedy show, that he plans to perform in the next few months at downtown Toronto night spots – The Underground Comedy Lab at The Idler Pub and at Spirits.

Video an account of rescue of Danish Jews during Holocaust

Miracle At Midnight; Liberty Heights now on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two films of great interest to many readers, Miracle At Midnight and Liberty Heights, recently arrived in video stores. Miracle At Midnight is the true story of the rescue of the Danish Jews during World War II. In 1943, the German occupation forces in Denmark planned to round up all the Jews in that country on the eve of Rosh Hashanah.

The Danish underground learned about these planned deportations and mobilized the population to hide the Jews until they could be smuggled out of Denmark by boat.

The film focuses on Karl Koster, a surgeon in Denmark who helped hide many Jews and who worked with the underground to rescue the Jewish population of that country.

Sam Waterston plays Koster, and Mia Farrow and Justin Whalin have supporting roles. The film was produced by John Davis, whose father-in-law lived in Denmark at the time and whose parents hid a Jewish family in their home.

Some 96 percent of the Jewish population of Denmark survived the war because of the actions of the Danish underground, and Davis was determined to make a film of this unusual and exemplary chapter in the history of the Holocaust.

Produced by Disney and originally aired on the weekly Wonderful World of Disney television program, the film was at first available on video only by special order directly from Disney

Another recent release is Barry Levinson's Liberty Heights. This film tends to meander a bit, but tells the story of a Jewish family in Baltimore in 1954, a period when the times were changing rapidly and the Jewish community in America was forced to change with the times.

The film focuses on the two sons of the Kurtzman family. The oldest son is attending college and becomes obsessed by a rich, upper class, Christian girl. He finally tracks her down and gets to know her, only to discover that her life is not as glamorous as it looks to an outsider.

The younger son is also exploring new territory. He becomes friends with a Black girl who has just started attending his school after desegregation arrives in Baltimore. He is fascinated by her lifestyle and her music.

All of this occurs after the two sons had grown up within a very insular world where they believed that everyone in Baltimore was Jewish and that the entire world was centred around the Jewish community.

Movie a reflection of U.S. society

Some of the scenes are hilarious and specifically directed to a Jewish audience. In fact, this is one film where you do have to be Jewish to appreciate the full meaning of some of the scenes.

At one screening I attended, about 25 percent of the audience left during the first half hour. They probably could not understand all the innuendoes and hidden messages within the text of the film.

This film was inspired by a film reviewer's comments about a previous Levinson production, Spheres. For some reason the reviewer ascribed many Jewish characteristics to the role played by Dustin Hoffman in that film.

Levinson was offended by these remarks and immediately began writing a screenplay that revolved around his own experiences as a child growing up in Baltimore.

While Levinson says that not all of the events portrayed in this film actually happened to him, most of them are based on experiences various members of his extended family went through.

I also suppose that a certain amount of literary licence was used in fleshing out some of the various scenes shown in the film.

Still, Liberty Heights provides an interesting reflection of American society, and of the Jewish community within that society, some 50 years ago and shows the long distance we have travelled since that time. It is also noteworthy how the film still has a great deal of meaning to today's audience, especially to the Jewish members of that audience.

Miracle At Midnight and Liberty Heights were released by major studios and should be readily available everywhere.

Depression said to be more common in women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women are twice as likely as men to be diagnosed with depression says an author and Canadian medical health journalist.

"More often than men, women find themselves in situations that are intolerable," says M. Sara Rosenthal, author of Women and Sadness: A Sane Approach to Depression (Macmillan Canada).

The social triggers for depression in women are distinctly different than for men, she says.

In the corporate structure, women have to fit into a male world and then play the woman's role at home. "It is usually the woman who decides how to raise the children. It's a dual role, and it can be very stressful.

"As well, sexism still persists in the workplace, and very few women are promoted to positions of power."

Rosenthal, 37, who has a master's degree in sociology and bioethics from the University of Toronto's Joint Centre for Bioethics, says that Judaism is a patriarchal religion. "Women do not always feel welcomed. If they buy into that concept then they are all right, but it can feel very excluding. The infrastructure of Judaism as a religion is not designed for bodies that breast feed."

The media often attacks women for not being supermoms or superwomen, and no one can live up to the media's standards of beauty, she says.

"Many women never feel thin enough. [Weight issues] become even more difficult during the holidays when food becomes a major concern. Women may feel pressured to put together big meals, and then feel guilty for partaking in them because they don't feel deserving."

Depression may also occur because of lifestyle changes, says Rosenthal. "Women often become depressed when they have children or when their kids grow up and leave home."

Crying or feeling low, she says, is a normal response to grief or an unhappy circumstance. "It is when women feel numb and see no reason to get up in the morning that they are probably depressed."

Prescribing drugs for women who are depressed is called cosmetic psychiatry by some, she says. "Doctors often give drugs when the women really just need to talk. The question is whether the doctor just wants to give out the drug, or deal with the cause of the depression.

"Obviously, if the woman is totally non-functioning, drugs are necessary, but most women are functioning. Antidepressants are very powerful, and there has been a problem with the lack of disclosure about their side effects. People have to be weaned off these drugs and too many women are not told of the risks involved."

A woman's age and marital status are frequently factors in depression. "Single, aging or divorced women are often treated as non-women and feel alienated by society." Validating a woman's position in life can go a long way in fighting depression, Rosenthal says.

A therapist does not have to be a woman to offer patients a woman-centred approach to therapy, says Rosenthal. "It is certainly not the only approach to therapy, but it can help a woman to validate her life.

"Feminist therapy can help women develop a sense of self and see that their feelings of low self-esteem, worthlessness, inadequacy, poor body image or anxiety, are normal responses to the world around them, rather than symptoms of a disease."

It is important for women to realize that emotional pain is not a medical problem but a normal response to one's environment. "In other words, pain in response to a bad situation is normal, not sick."

Women who feel they need help dealing with their life should definitely seek help whether it is in the form of talk therapy or perhaps medication, she says. "It can be a daunting task finding someone to talk to and for this reason, many women do not find proper help."

A primary care doctor can make a referral, and if that is not feasible most communities have women's health clinics, she says. A crisis counsellor can also refer you to people for more long-term counselling.

New prostate treatment

MONTREAL — A new surgical procedure for prostate cancer that greatly reduces recovery time and complications, will soon be performed at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH).

The technique, known as laparoscopic radical prostatectomy, involves introducing a small tube – about the diameter of a pen– into the abdomen. The tube is equipped with a miniature camera and surgical instruments.

Rather than the long incision necessary in traditional open surgery, a laparoscopic prostatectomy involves only four or five very small skin incisions.

"Laparoscopic radical prostatectomy offers several advantages to patients including considerably less post-operative pain and a much quicker recuperation period. Patients can resume complete activity after one week as opposed to a two-month recovery period," said Dr. Jacques Corcos, chief of urology at JGH.

"Since this procedure is more precise, we also expect that it will significantly reduce complications such as impotence and incontinence."

Laparoscopic prostatectomy was developed in Europe over the last few years.

Surgeons there have reported similar results in terms of survival rates to those obtained through conventional surgery, Corcos said.

Corcos noted that "radical prostectomy, which consists of the total removal of the prostate, is the best treatment option in localized prostate cancer – that which is confined to the gland – in patients who are less than 72 years of age."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My five-year-old has a very good friend with a peanut allergy. What precautions should I take when this child is playing at my house and how do I know what snacks are safe to offer him? I want him and his parents to feel that he is safe and welcome in our home.

A. I am glad to see that you are concerned and being responsible about this child's peanut allergy. I would start by speaking to his parents and asking if he carries an epi pen, and if so, whether he knows how to use it and where he keeps it.

Next, ask the parents to suggest snacks that they feel comfortable feeding this child and serve those.

Obviously, things like fruit and vegetables are safe snacks, but be sure that there is no chance for cross-contamination of nut products in your kitchen – for example that the knife or cutting board being used to cut an apple for this child was not used to cut a peanut butter sandwich this morning without being thoroughly washed.

Also ensure that other people in the house are not touching or eating nut products while this child is there, and that if peanuts were consumed by anyone in the house prior to this little boy's arrival, hands and kitchen utensils used were thoroughly washed. People with peanut allergies can have a reaction from a mere touch to the skin.

If you want to serve a snack beyond fruit or vegetables, look for sealed items with listed ingredients on the package that clearly do not say that they do or may contain bits or traces of nuts. Avoid buying items from open bins like those in bulk food stores; and avoid bakeries, unless the bakery is nut free. Non-nut-containing items can easily come in contact with items that do contain nuts, and the same applies for ice cream in open bins.

Toxicologist to study herbal products

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Mark Goldberg of Guelph, a toxicologist, has been named by Health Canada to an advisory committee of 15 that will study the medicinal properties of plants.

Fifty-six percent of Canadians are using herbal products as complementary medicine, according to a report compiled in 1997 by Canadian Health Food Association, which represents manufacturers of health food products.

Among the items to be studied are St. John's wort, ginko biloba, echinacea and ginseng.

An associate professor at Ontario Veterinary College at the University of Guelph for 10 years, Goldberg is a principal of Global Tox International Consultants, which he founded eight years ago with two other professors from University of Guelph.

He said the committee is just starting its work, but one recommendation it will certainly propose is that regulations be established requiring manufacturers to label their products accurately.

One of the committee's concerns, he said, is that the plants' roots must be used in the formulation of a product, because the roots contain the medicinal properties.

"These products should be in the stores, but they should be properly labelled and they are not now," Goldberg said.

The 1997 report presented to the federal government by the CHFA said $115.6 million in business was done by retailers, distributors and manufacturers of these products, he said.

"It's a big business which is unregulated now."

'Excuse me? I made the bridge collapse?'

CJN News Services

Yoram Eyal was chair of the organizing committee at the 1997 Maccabiah Games. Eyal, who hired the contractor responsible for building the bridge, received a one-year suspended sentence and six months community service for causing death by negligence. Here is an edited report about his trial, including transcripts, as reported by Sara Leibovich-Dar of Ha'aretz.

The contractor, Irgunit, obtained the contract for the bridge at a cost of 85,000 shekels. The Israeli army, which for years had built the bridge at no cost, in 1996 had asked for 288,000 shekels to complete the job.

Examination of Irgunit's engineering capability was desultory.

Eyal: "I asked Adam Mishori, 'Adam, can you put up a bridge?' The answer was yes."

"Did he tell you he had experience in building bridges?" asked prosecutor Hadas Forrer-Gafni.

Eyal: "He didn't say that he had experience in constructing bridges. He said explicitly: 'I can construct that bridge.' I did not check with Adam Mishori if he had constructed such a bridge in the past."

Forrer-Gafni: "Why didn't you, as a public body, check whether Irgunit was a company registered in the Contractor's Registry in a category that would qualify it to build bridges?"

Eyal: "Those are the facts. I did not check. I did not check because – and I'll say it again – I think that if Irgunit, from my knowledge of the company, from the experience we had, from our assurances about the company, I am convinced that if Irgunit had not been able to build the bridge, couldn't have done it, or thought they were not allowed to, they would have told us."

Irgunit hired a subcontractor, the Ben-Ezra Karagola company, since it had no experience building bridges. But neither did the sub-contractor.

Even though Eyal was responsible for the organization, he told police he did not know Irgunit had subcontracted the bridge construction job until after the bridge collapsed.

After the bridge was built, Eyal went to the site to check it. He told the court he jumped up and down on it and shook the handrails.

Forrer-Gafni: "I put it to you that the only reason you jumped on the bridge and shook the handrail was because you had a bad feeling about it."

Eyal: "I saw wooden boards, I jumped on them. I saw a handrail, I shook it. All in all just because I wanted to see what was there. That was all."

Forrer-Gafni: "We have not seen any certification of the ramp that was connected to the bridge on the day of the [opening] ceremony. Didn't that bother you?"

Eyal: "No."

Forrer-Gafni: "Why not?"

Eyal: "It didn't need an engineer's certification. In that area I certainly rely on Moshe Yanni, the producer who has run the stadium show for three consecutive Maccabiah Games. He knows the whole business thoroughly."

Forrer-Gafni: "What training does Yanni have in the field of safety?"

Eyal: "He has no training."

* * *

Eyal doesn't know where he will serve his sentence.

"I've heard you can read books to the blind in the library for the blind in Netanya. I love microphones. That sounds nice."

"So you want to enjoy yourself for the next six months?" Ha'aretz asked.

"Do you have any idea what a punishment community service is for me? It's an insulting punishment. I was a member of a prisoners' aid association – I used to bring shampoo for prisoners in the Neve Tirtza women's jail. Now let's see who will bring me gifts."

"It's a bit difficult to feel sorry for you and your shampoo when one recalls that four people were killed and 70 were injured in that tragedy."

"Excuse me? I made the bridge collapse?"

"No, but you were responsible for everything that happened there."

"The person chiefly responsible for the collapse of the bridge was the engineer – and I am someone who pushes the blame onto junior staff. I believed that my position was an honorary one, but it turned out that it also involved responsibility. When you are responsible, you are liable to make mistakes and to make people unhappy, and then you have to stand boldly behind the mistakes you make."

* * *

The tragedy, the trial and the sentence have affected Eyal's life only slightly. He resigned as chair of the organizing committee of the Maccabiah games – "I loved the sports people – welcoming them at the airport, organizing them, transporting them, I won't be doing that any more" – and from his other positions in World Maccabi. He was a director, a member of the secretariat and of the international committee of the organization. However, he remains manager of the Maccabi Village Hotel which belongs to the Maccabi World Union (MWU). No one has asked him to resign, and Eyal is not about to offer himself up as a sacrifice.

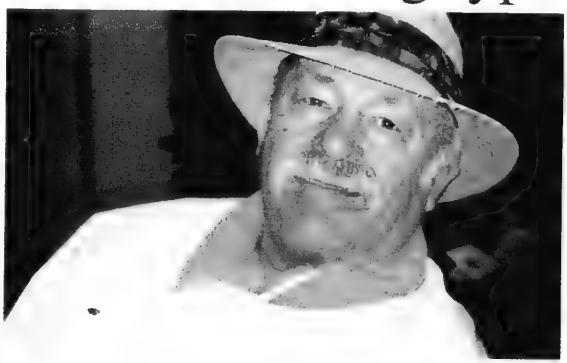
Horse trainer not the retiring type

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN



Max Bidner

BUFFALO — Max Bidner came to horse racing in a round about way – with roots all the way back to Russia.

"My grandfather came over to get away from the pogroms," said Bidner, one of the few Jewish race horse trainers at Fort Erie.

"In Russia he was a tavern-keeper; in Alberta he was a coal miner. Then the government gave people land to farm on and and he stayed at it. When I was three, my parents were struggling to make a living, so they left me with my grandparents."

Bidner began to ride on the farm and soon could handle horses so well, he was asked to join the Canadian Olympic team.

"I rode all over, in Dublin, across Europe and in Madison Square Garden," he recalled. "The best horses I rode [while] on the team were Black Hawk and the Tramp, on which I was second in the $10,000 'big jump' in Harrisburg.

"I trained my own horses and sold some of the best ones. I sold Toy Soldier to the U.S. Olympic team for $25,000 – big money back them. Now, a world class jumper like that would sell for a million dollars."

He also sold Pistol Pete to Torchy Millar of the Canadian team and helped Ian Millar when "Captain Canada" was just starting his show ring career.

Bidner, who says he's "Jack Benny's age – 39 and counting," turned to training thoroughbreds for racing because at the time, the purses paid more. But times have been tough and he's usually raced in the winters to keep busy. Lately, however, he's been able to "retire" when the Fort Erie season ends and spend the winter in more temperate locations.

Still, he always was able to save enough to pay the college and medical school tuitions for his son Sheldon (Sandy), now a successful surgeon in Dallas, and "the only one of my children who was talented as a rider."

Another son, Nathan, is a stock broker in Arizona, while the rest of his children are all in the Ottawa area: Cheryl, who is married; Shawn, who owns a beauty salon; Brady, an artist and musician who lived in Israel for a time; and Kevin, a computer specialist.

"I really was happy that none of my children caught 'the horse bug,'" Bidner admitted. "It would have interfered with their educations. And maybe I should have stayed in the clothing chain that I was a partner in for a time."

Bidner now has a comparatively small stable at Fort Erie, and he sells many horses that are too slow for racing to friends from his show jumping days.

ישעיה ברלין - ביוגרפיה

לו הייתי מתבקשת להגדיר את הייחודי בדמותו של ישעיה ברלין הייתי בוחרת לציין בפליאה את מידת האושר האישי שברלין ידע בחייו. בפליאה מפני שברלין היה עד לזוועות ואומללות איומה, אך הוא, כבני ישראל העוברים ביבשה ובצידם עמודי מים אדירים, ספג, חקר והביע את הזוועות אך הוא אישית לא נפגע. בוודאי היו בחייו רגעי שפל אך עקרונית אפשר לסכם בוודאות שסיפור חייו של אחד מגדולי המאה העשרים הוא סיפור מאושר. הוא לא היה אדיש, חס וחלילה לסבל ולהרס שידעה האנושות במאה מרושעת זו; להפך, הוא הפך לדוברה המתוחכם ביותר אך עלה בידו לנווט את מסכת חייו האישית בשלווה ואושר. יתכן שסודו טמון בעובדה שהוא לא מיהר להתבגר; בשלותו האינטלקטואלית (והמינית) באה לידי מימוש בגיל מתקדם יחסית. יתכן שחידתו שורשה בילדותו המאושרת ובהיותו ילד כה אהוב שלמד לאהוב אחרים ולאהוב את עצמו. כך או כך, הגורמים האנליטיים בעיצוב אישיותו חשובים הרבה פחות מהשגיו שאין שני להם.

בחדרו שבאוקספורד נועדו מגדולי הפילוסופים. מכל פינות העולם נהרו המונים לשמוע אותו. כוחו לא היה בכתיבה אלא בהגות שבעל-פה. אבי, שזכה להיות מידיד עמו, סיפר לי שכל הרצאה של ברלין הייתה מעוררת סערה. מאות היו מצטופפים באולם ההרצאות והוא היה סוחף את המאזינים מפילוסופיה לספרות, להיסטוריה, לאומנות וחזרה והם היו מתענגים מהשפע, משטף המליצה, מפניני הלשון, מההומור ומחדות ההשיבה שאין לה שיעור.

שנים רבות סרב לכתוב את זכרונותיו אך לבסוף בחר במייקל אינגטייף כאיש שיכתוב את עדותו הביוגרפית. כל מי שמבקש להכיר את ההוגה ההומני ביותר מקרב מעצבי הפילוסופיה בת-זמננו, מי שנחשב ליהודי החכם בדורו, חייב בקריאת ביוגרפיה מאלפת זו.

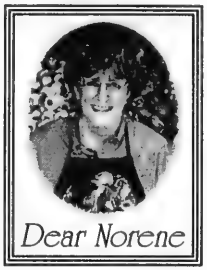
About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

Summertime is a great time to enjoy vegetables and fruits. They are refreshing, taste terrific and are considered key players in the fight against heart disease, stroke and cancer.

Are you getting enough? Set your goal at five to 10 a day. Here are 10 great tips adapted from www.5to10aday.com. Also check out www.cancer.ca or call 1-888-939-3333.

• Top it off: Choose whole grain cereal with lowfat milk and fresh berries (raspberries, blueberries, strawberries) for a nutritious breakfast choice.

• Shake it up: For breakfast on the run or a delicious snack, blend 1 cup lowfat milk, ½ cup fresh fruit (e.g., peaches, bananas, strawberries) and five or six ice cubes. Add a scoop of lowfat frozen yogurt for the ultimate shake.

• Dashboard dining: Pack fresh fruit (apricots, pears, plums) and some napkins or moist towelettes in your purse, briefcase or knapsack.

• Melon out: Watermelon, cantaloupe or honeydew are refreshing favourites. Choose fresh fruit instead of something gooey for dessert!

• Weekend fun: Looking for an inexpensive, fun family outing? Visit a farm and pick your own produce. Vegetables and fruit don't get any cheaper, fresher or more delicious than this!

• Sensational strawberries: Mix fresh strawberries with a dash of balsamic vinegar and a touch of sugar. For a decadent dessert, dip strawberries into either chocolate sauce or light sour cream and then brown sugar.

• Get green: Salads are a great summertime food. Use darker, more nutritious greens like romaine and spinach. Add cherry tomatoes and sliced carrots for extra flavour and nutrition. For an easy and delicious fruit salad, mix cut-up fresh fruit with fruit-flavoured yogurt.

• Get grilling: Fire up the barbecue! Use firm, ripe produce like eggplant, leeks, peppers, mushrooms, squash or corn on the cob. To prevent sticking, lightly baste with vegetable oil or a non-stick spray. Sprinkle with fresh herbs. Don't forget about grilled fruit. Pineapple rings, grilled just until golden brown, are so tasty.

• Veg out: Dinnertime is a great time to load up on veggies like fresh asparagus, carrots, broccoli and mini-potatoes. Drizzle with olive oil, lemon juice and a shake of Parmesan cheese.

• Simply the best: One of the best things about vegetables and fruit in season is their taste. Choose a variety daily – enjoy in good health!

A Jewish VP? No problem

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

When Al Smith campaigned for U.S. president – and lost – in 1928, his Roman Catholicism was used against him.

When John F. Kennedy successfully ran for president in 1960, he felt the need to make speeches that distanced himself from the Pope.

Analysis

But Senator Joseph Lieberman's Orthodox Judaism is not likely to be a burden for him as the Democratic senator from Connecticut goes on the stump as Al Gore's running mate.

In fact, analysts say, Lieberman's beliefs may even help him and Gore. Americans apparently have come a long way when it comes to the acceptance of public officials from minority religions – even if they might have a little way to go, as indicated by this comment about Lieberman from Senator John Breaux (D-La.).

Attitudes have changed since Kennedy

"I think people don't care so much about where he goes to church on Sunday, but just that he has the moral values and principles to lead the country," Breaux said.

Despite misunderstandings about when and where Jews worship, a poll that has tracked American views on religion and the presidency supports the view that religion is less of a factor for voters than it used to be.

In 1937, the Gallup organization found that 46 percent of Americans would vote for a Jewish person for president. By 1999, that number had climbed to 92 percent.

Smith, the son of Irish immigrants, was the Democratic governor of New York when he ran for president in 1928 against Republican Herbert Hoover.

Smith had other things that hurt him in that election. He was against the prohibition on alcohol then in effect in the United States, and he was running against the incumbent party during a period of economic prosperity that lasted until the stock market crash of 1929 and the Great Depression.

But his religion was certainly a factor. One rumour circulated that Smith was in favour of building a tunnel underneath the Atlantic Ocean to connect Washington to the Vatican, and a leaflet published in New York read: "When the Catholics rule the United States, And the Jew grows a Christian nose on his face, When the Pope is the head of the Ku Klux Klan, In the land of the Uncle Sam, Then Al Smith will be our President, And the country not worth a damn."

Smith lost the election to Hoover, earning 41 percent of the vote.

By 1960, when Kennedy ran against Republican Richard Nixon, anti-Catholicism had waned, but it had not dissipated entirely.

Rabbi shocks Jewish world

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Ovadia Yosef's remarks about the sins of Holocaust victims shocked much of the Jewish world recently, but a prominent Canadian rabbi believes his comments have been misunderstood by those not attuned to the intricacies of kabbalistic theology.

In radio remarks broadcast in Israel, Rabbi Yosef, spiritual leader of the Shas party, said victims of Nazi murderers were "reincarnated souls of Jews who sinned in the past." The rabbi also stated Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak lacked "brains" and that by courting Palestinians in peace talks, he was "bringing snakes next to us."

Kosher Law

NEW YORK — Declaring that New York State's kosher laws excessively entangle government with religion, a Brooklyn federal judge has struck down the 118-year-old statutes as unconstitutional. Orthodox kosher law advocates immediately said they would appeal the decision, in which the judge ruled in favour of a Long Island butcher whose 1996 lawsuit claimed that the state's kosher laws violated church-state separation.

Shopping at Auschwitz

WARSAW — Poland will allow a controversial shopping centre to be built across the street from the site of the Auschwitz death camp. Ira Weinstein's family, which claims Syria provided support to Hamas at the time of the attack, is seeking $330 million (US) in damages.

Wiesenthal Honoured

WASHINGTON — Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal was among 15 people who received the highest U.S. civilian honor last week. President Bill Clinton awarded the Presidential Medals of Freedom at a White House ceremony last Wednesday.

Apology Issued

AMSTERDAM — The Amsterdam Stock Exchange has issued an apology for looting Jewish assets during World War II. In June, the exchange and the Dutch Banking Association agreed to pay $130.2 million to the local Jewish community.

JCC Shooting Still Before Courts

LOS ANGELES — It's been a year since Buford Furrow Jr. allegedly burst into the North Valley Jewish Community Centre here and started shooting, but the case against him is still slowly winding its way through the legal system.

Furrow, 38, is accused of wounding three young boys, a teenage counsellor and a receptionist at the Jewish centre last Aug. 10 with 70 bullets from a semi-automatic assault weapon. He is also accused of killing a U.S. mail carrier on the same day.

The decision to seek the death penalty, approved by U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno, brought into play numerous legal moves by the prosecution and defence, which automatically delayed the beginning of the trial.

Originally set to start on Nov. 14, the trial date was postponed to Feb. 6 of next year to give Furrow's lawyer additional time to prepare. The judge noted that 5,000 pages of documents had already been turned over to the defence – and there could be more.

Furrow, a white supremacist and member of the Aryan Nations, turned himself in to the FBI office in Las Vegas the day after the shooting rampage and allegedly told agents that his attack on the Jewish centre was "a wake-up call to Americans to kill Jews."

Fund-raising campaigns in memory of Matti

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Officials in the Russian-Jewish community hope the Matti Baranovski Drop-in Centre will blunt the influences that led to the violent and tragic death of its namesake.

A fund in Matti's memory was launched recently by his mother Olga and the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC).

Money raised will go toward opening a centre that will offer teens after-school and weekend activities, computer training, anger management counselling, recreational events and instruction in Jewish heritage – all designed to keep them out of trouble.

Baranovski, a Grade 11 student, was beaten to death at G. Ross Lord park last November after an argument with a gang of young toughs over cigarettes and money.

One suspect in the case is still fighting extradition from Israel, where he fled soon after the murder.

The incident shone a light on youth violence, particularly among Jewish-Russian and other immigrant teenagers.

JRCC officials say that many young people whose families immigrate here from the former Soviet Union were raised in a climate of oppression, fear and sometimes, brutalization.

"They brought their anger with them," says a JRCC statement. "We want to change the direction some of them are taking."

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, executive director of the JRCC, says at least $200,000 is needed to open the centre and get it up and running.

The JRCC is scouting a site. Rabbi Zaltzman says a centre will be located where ex-Soviet Jews are most concentrated in Toronto.

Igor Korenzvit, chair of the JRCC's board of governors, says current programs offered in the ex-Soviet community have not kept up with needs.

"We have not addressed problems to the level we should have," he conceded.

He said fund-raising will be conducted in both the Jewish and general communities.

"This is not just a Russian issue."

In separate initiatives, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto is co-ordinating a three-year project that aims to increase both the quality and quantity of outreach programs to immigrant youth in the Bathurst Street corridor, between Finch and Steeles. The project is being funded by a $250,000 gift to UJA FEDERATION from a private donor following the Baranovski murder.

In late June, the Jewish-Russian Initiative, started by 35 mothers, held a concert that raised $10,000 for immigrant youth programs.

And at the same time as public fund-raising goes on for the Baranovski centre, students at Northview Heights Secondary School, where Matti had been a promising pupil, have raised over $6,000 through the sale of memorial backpack patches.

The money will be split between Kids Help Phone, a bilingual helpline for children and teens, and CAVEAT, which promotes violence prevention programs and advocates for victims' rights.

Area merchants, community groups, parents and other schools within the Toronto District School Board, as well as private and Catholic schools, have agreed to sell 6,000 patches at $5 each.

The patches may be purchased at Northview Heights when classes resume next month. The school may be reached at 416-395-3290.

U of T chemical physicist wins Canada's highest scientific award

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Paul Brumer, a University of Toronto chemical physicist, is one of the winners of this year's Killam Prize, Canada's highest scientific award.

The prize, worth $75,000, honours eminent Canadian scholars and scientists actively engaged in research in universities, industry or government agencies.

It is awarded by the Canada Council for the Arts.

Brumer, 55, holds the Roel Buck chair in chemical physics at the U of T, with which he has been associated since 1975.

He has made major contributions to theoretical chemical physics, an area of research dedicated to using physics, mathematics and computer modelling to understand the nature of chemical processes.

Brumer has been in the forefront of studies on statistical theories of chemical reactions, on the relationship between classical and quantum laws of motion, on the study of quantum chaos, and on the utility of semi-classical mechanics in chemistry.

In 1986, he and his colleague, Weizmann Institute of Science professor Moshe Shapiro, introduced a field of research now known as coherent control of molecular processes.

It is dedicated to using the quantum laws of molecules to control their motion and alter chemical reactions.

It has no military applications, Brumer said in an interview. But it does have practical applications in pharmaceutical chemistry and in opto-electronic devices.

Paul Brumer

Over the past 14 years, he and Shapiro have shown how lasers can be used to encode quantum mechanical information into molecules.

Their research has opened up an entirely new branch of science.

"In addition, from a purely scientific point of view, I am pleased that my other work has established a connection between classical mechanics, the mechanics which describes the behaviour of macroscopic objects with which we are familiar, and quantum mechanics, the general theory of motion of objects whose characteristics are most readily discerned in the world of atoms and molecules," he explained.

Brumer is also project leader at Photonics Research Ontario, established by the provincial government to fund research with potential applications to enhance Ontario's economic viability.

Born in New York City, and educated at Brooklyn College and Harvard University, Brumer began his academic career at Harvard.

"I came to the U of T because it had an outstanding chemistry department with great strengths in theoretical chemical physics and in the study of chemical reactions," said Brumer.

He is the son of Abraham and Barbara Brumer, who were born in Poland and Romania, respectively.

"My father was a hard-working, honest businessman," he said, " and my mother was a homemaker until later in life, when she worked in my uncle's business."

Canada, he said, is highly advanced in chemical physics. "At the U of T alone, there are over 10 faculty members at the forefront of this field. Two of Canada's winners of Nobel Prizes – Gerhard Herzberg of the National Research Council and John Polanyi of the U of T – helped found this area of research."

Brumer and his wife, Abbey, have four children – Debbie, an occupational therapist; Jeremy, an IBM programmer; Yisroel, a graduate student in chemical physics at Harvard; and Bracha, a U of T student.

His brother, Rabbi Pinchas Brumer, is a Hebrew principal at the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto's junior high school, while his sister-in-law, Matty Brumer, is co-ordinator of Kosher Meals on Wheels.

New chair urges women to donate independently

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dodi Weill has a larger portfolio — and executive — than any of her predecessors.

Dodi Weill

In June, the first chair of UJA FEDERATION's newly merged entity, Women's Campaign and Advocacy, succeeded Janice Langer, president of Jewish Women's Federation, and Carole Sterling, who led last year's Women's Campaign.

As chair of the new entity, Weill deals with myriad projects, addressing issues including abuse, poverty and agunot. Although several endeavours are close to her heart, she will – when pressed – single one out, albeit reluctantly.

Her "baby," if any of the projects can be described that way, is the quest to have women donate to the campaign in their own names. Although Toronto has at least 50,000 potential donors who are women, only 6,000 gave independent gifts last year, Weill said in a recent interview at her home.

At her installation in June, she noted that women have an obligation to transmit their values to the next generation. "No one can perform a mitzvah for another person," she noted. "We are role models for our families... [Giving a gift in one's own name] connects us in a very personal way to our community...it speaks to our identity as Jewish women who care about the needs and are willing to stand up and be counted."

On a practical level, more names could indicate greater strength in a lobbying situation, she noted.

Weill, an English teacher who now tutors privately, would like to educate women about the reasons for becoming involved, and was instrumental in creating a new pamphlet, Why A Woman's Gift?

A strong believer in education – and in programs that aren't "fluffy" – Weill completed her BA in Sociology at York University as an adult, one course at a time over 15 years, and has begun working toward an Honours degree.

The mother of four and new grandmother is also pulled toward Women's Campaign and Advocacy outreach programs, especially a recent one for women from the former Soviet Union.

Having immigrated here herself at age 14, Weill feels "very connected" to the project. "I feel we made such an effort to bring [Jews from the former Soviet Union] out, and then not to do the next step, to integrate them, is wrong."

A native of St. Annes, a seaside town on England's west coast, Weill developed a strong Jewish identity both through family involvement in the Jewish community of 300, and interaction with her non-Jewish peers. "You could never forget you were Jewish," she said. "You were always made to feel different."

Her community involvement as an adult has included stints as sisterhood president at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where her husband of 30 years, Bob, is now vice-president; as Toronto chair for State of Israel Bonds, as North American vice-chair of Israel Bonds and national chair for Canada.

The sense of commitment she felt as a youth group member was heightened by her first trip to Israel in 1967. "I was completely hooked," she said.

On a more recent trip, she saw "the big eyes of those Ethiopian kids [who benefit from some of the campaign dollars]. You know you're doing good stuff." Campaign funds assist projects overseas and locally.

To help women in Toronto know where UJA dollars go, Women's Campaign and Advocacy is planning three local "bus missions" this fall (Sept. 14, Oct. 30 and Nov. 15). Some of the destinations (three per mission) are the Bernard Betel Centre, Jews for Judaism, Jewish Family & Child Service and Zareinu Educational Centre.

Last year, Women's Campaign raised $4.4 million, approximately 10 percent of the total for Toronto.

The new organization is much more streamlined, Weill said. It was felt the two parent organizations were reaching out to the same women, she explained.

"Now we represent one of the strongest groups in North America." By merging the two groups, Toronto is following a trend that began in the United States; in Canada, Women's Campaign and Advocacy is a pioneer.

Canada continuing to accept 'refugees' from Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada continues to grant refugee status to claimants from Israel – most of them former Soviet Jews – believing their tales of persecution in the Jewish state.

According to the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), Canada last year accepted 29 refugees from Israel and rejected 305 others, based on 422 claims finalized. The rest were either abandoned or withdrawn.

A further 261 cases were pending.

The acceptance rate of refugees from Israel last year was seven percent, the highest in three years.

In 1998, Canada granted refugee status to 24 asylum seekers from Israel, based on 997 cases. The acceptance rate that year was 2.4 percent.

Fewer referrals wound up before IRB panels in 1999 than the year before, but about as many claimants were accepted.

The whole issue of Canada's acceptance of refugees from Israel continues to be a sore point between the two countries.

Since 1989, when the first wave of Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada that ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to springboard to this country.

Israel has always denied that it produces refugees, saying the claimants' stories of persecution are spurious.

Typically, former Soviet Jews, who come here as Israeli citizens, claim that while in the Jewish state, they were harassed, denied jobs and housing, and even beaten because of mixed marriages or questionable Jewish status.

To qualify as refugees here, they must prove they have a well-founded fear of persecution should they be returned to Israel.

Canada's acceptance rate of Israeli refugees peaked in 1991 at 69 percent of all claims. The rate in 1998 was the lowest ever.

In the first three months of this year, Canada accepted three Israeli refugee claims, out of 81 finalized.

In a statement, Israel's embassy in Ottawa said that while it is pleased the number of refugee claimants has dropped dramatically during the past year, "we are disappointed that the acceptance rate has increased during this period.

"As a democratic state with a legal system that is internationally recognized for its judicial fairness and independence, it is inconceivable that Israel should be a source of refugees. Thus, there is no reason that Canada should be accepting refugee claimants from the State of Israel."

BGU, Sunnybrook to honour surgeon

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a cardiovascular surgeon, Bernard Goldman finds his work "exciting, rewarding, challenging and demanding."

Among his recent patients was an 88-year-old who underwent heart valve surgery. When Goldman's father, Philip, died in 1980 of heart disease at age 69, however, his age seemed "advanced." At that time, recalled Goldman – himself a youthful 64 – bypass surgery was less than a decade old, and complications were more common.

"It's a complete revolution," he said in a recent interview at his comfortably appointed office at the Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, where he is currently surgeon-in-chief and where he was involved, in an administrative capacity, in the development of the hospital's Schulich Heart Centre.

Goldman will be honoured Oct. 26 at the Sheraton Centre by his hospital and the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, an organization co-founded by his late father.

The tribute event will inaugurate the Dr. Bernard S. Goldman Endowment Fund for Cardiovascular Research, with funding to be split 50-50 between the two institutions.

Although the specific area of research has yet to be decided, Goldman's interest lies in innovative valve reconstruction and valve replacement, as well as coronary bypass surgery.

Goldman moved to Sunnybrook almost 11 years ago to head its new cardiac surgical centre, after two decades at Toronto General Hospital.

He has long had a "soft spot" for BGU, both through his professional affiliation – having lectured there and trained some BGU heart surgeons here – and through the involvement of his father, who was the Toronto chapter's second president.

Like his father, Goldman has visited Israel over a dozen times. He has also been a visiting professor at Hadassah Hospital and was involved in setting up the heart unit at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre.

Goldman and his sister, Ellie Tesher, along with their father's partners at Shoppers Drug Mart, undertook a BGU lectureship in Philip Goldman's memory for several years after his death.

Bernie Goldman, like his father, is sensitive to the "underdog," he said. Because Ben-Gurion University and Sunnybrook Hospital both lacked the "cachet" of (respectively) the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Toronto General Hospital, "like Avis, it just meant [they] had to work harder," he said. "In both instances, it has paid off."

Dr. Bernard Goldman

Sunnybrook, at one time, was "sort of an outpost" compared to downtown teaching hospitals. Now, Goldman noted, it's "in the geographic centre of the city. There has been a growth of academic excellence here, and community recognition."

And BGU, with 15,000 students, is now "the in place to go," said Goldman, citing a lower cost of living, an architecturally beautiful campus, and unique programs (such as its medical outreach program to Bedouins and immigrants).

Its 950-bed Soroka hospital holds almost twice as many in-patients as Sunnybrook (if you exclude the latter's long-term care and mental health beds).

Although Goldman stepped down in January as head of cardiovascular surgery, he intends to continue operating for at least a couple of years after he turns 65. His decade at Sunnybrook has been "a great adventure," he says. "It's been so satisfying. This has been such a source of pride."

He plans to maintain his academic involvement as incoming editor-in-chief of the Journal of Cardiac Surgery, effective January 2001.

Joseph Lieberman

It was a bold, courageous, historic decision. By selecting Senator Joseph Lieberman, a Jew, as his vice-presidential running mate, Al Gore, the vice-president and Democratic party presidential hopeful, shattered a hoary barrier whose passing may yet benefit all minorities in the United States.

Until last week, the conventional wisdom had been that America was not ready for a Jew on a major national political ticket, despite the fact that Jews already have filled important and prestigious positions in the federal government. Arthur Goldberg served as ambassador to the United Nations. Henry Kissinger was secretary of state and Harold Brown was secretary of defence. Edward Levi and Robert Rubin were secretary of justice and secretary of the treasury, respectively. John Deutsch directed the Central Intelligence Agency. Currently, Alan Greenspan is chair of the Federal Reserve, Samuel Berger is President Bill Clinton's national security advisor, and Leon Fuerth is Gore's foreign affairs advisor.

And yet the consensus was that, because of anti-Semitic sentiment, a Jewish American could not aspire to be vice-president, much less president. The precedent had been established. In 1976, Milton Shapp, the Jewish governor of Pennsylvania, tried but failed to secure the Democratic party's nomination for president. In 1984, Walter Mondale, the Democratic standard-bearer, chose Geraldine Ferraro rather than Diane Feinstein for the number 2 spot. In 1996, Arlen Specter, the sole Jewish Republican U.S. senator, toyed with the idea of throwing his hat into the ring, but abandoned the quest even before the primaries.

Gore – a canny politician of substance who stands head and shoulders above his Republican rival George Bush in terms of experience, knowledge and sheer savvy – was acutely cognizant of this iron rule of American politics. But in an inspired masterstroke, which appears to have revitalized his campaign, Gore broke with tradition, He chose Lieberman, an observant Jew from Connecticut whose reputation for integrity and rectitude stems in part from a 1998 speech in which he deplored Clinton's sexual dalliance with Monica Lewinsky, a White House intern half his age.

It remains to be seen whether Gore's calculated gamble ultimately will be a liability or an asset. Although the United States is a great democracy, it is, lamentably, a society riddled with ethnocentrism and prejudice. Online chat rooms and Internet message boards were flooded with anti-Jewish slurs immediately after Gore's announcement, and an African-American civil rights leader cast aspersions on Jews. On the other hand, a USA Today poll found that Lieberman's inclusion on the ticket had turned the presidential race into a dead heat. In the post-Lieberman environment, the United States has come of age as a pluralistic nation. But it's clear that the Lieberman factor will also be a crucial acid test of religious tolerance in America. – S.K.

It's only Rock 'n' Roll

I found Elliott Malamet's column on music and adolescence "Music Plays to an Audience of One" (CJN, June 27), almost as amusing as I did frustrating. As a high school teacher like him, I have to wonder when the last time was that Malamet actually engaged one of his students in a discussion about the music they listen to and that inspires them. My guess from the tone of his article is never.

First off, opening with a quote from The Merchant of Venice, writing of Gershwin or Brahms and quoting Harold Bloom on classical music immediately betrayed that Malamet is sorely out of touch with his own student audience. He condescendingly assumes – and rather incorrectly, I believe – that "rock music has always provided a shallow yet convenient outlet for teen frustration."

I'm not sure what he listened to as a teenager, but perhaps he should take a few moments out of his class to listen to the Walkmans he believes "disguise" people as human beings.

He selectively cites angry Smashing Pumpkins lyrics "God is empty, just like me," and makes the sweeping generalization that this characterizes all adolescents; the truth is, it may reflect an emptiness today's adolescents feel – something their teachers, especially their Jewish studies teachers – should be attuned to.

Perhaps if Malamet listened to one of his students' Walkmans he might find them listening to Jerry Garcia reminding them to "Wake up to find that you are the eyes of the world," or "May God bless and keep you always… May you grow up to be righteous, may you grow up to be true. May you always know the truth and see the lights surrounding you."

Of course it may be Bob Marley urging them to "emancipate yourselves from mental slavery, none but ourselves can free our mind," or perhaps Ben Harper singing: "So long as someone else controls your history, the truth shall remain just a mystery; for you can lead a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink. You can put a man through school but you cannot make him think."

Music is not meant to "replace the difficult and demanding task of learning to build a spiritual self," but it is a healing balm that often inspires adolescents to persevere in their task of building a spiritual self when they feel misunderstood by those who stand behind the desk and preach as though they understand them. Especially in a Jewish school that seeks to inspire their Jewish selves, maybe we need to ask why they are turning to music, and not to their teachers.

Kadosh is real

Re: Letter to the editor, "Kadosh is not kadosh" (CJN, July 27). Kadosh is real. I also found the movie repulsive and an insult, but I also think it is very real.

Yes, women are considered as second-class citizens in Judaism, as per Genesis 3:16 (woman shall be ruled by man); Numbers, chapters 1 and 4 (women not mentioned in the census); Numbers 5:14 (law in favour of suspecting husband); Numbers, chapter 26 (another women-ignoring census); Numbers, chapters 27 and 36 (restricting women's rights as land owners); Numbers, chapter 30 (woman's hierarchical position in the family); Leviticus 10:15 (women can never be the kohen); Leviticus 21:9 (daughter of a kohen to be burned if she commits prostitution); Deuteronomy 22:24 (women's credibility as a rape victim).

Yes, it is disgusting to see the old truck driving around the streets of Mea Shearim shouting profanities at the goyim over a loudspeaker. Yes, it is unfair to automatically and unilaterally blame the wife for not being able to bear children – to the point of divorce. And yes, the general attitude towards women (and seculars) in the movie is of a medieval mentality.

If the movie is guilty of honesty, maybe it is time to expose and reject these "holy" concepts.

Welsh Jews

I am one of the Welsh Jews from the valleys, the region portrayed in the film by Paul Morrison which Sheldon Kirshner wrote about (CJN, June 8). I was born in Abertysswg, not far from New Tredegar and Tredegar, and lived there from 1921 until we moved to London in 1939. I was pleased to hear that someone made a film about Jewish life in the valleys of South Wales.

My father, Baruch Crabbe (Krapivnik – a Litvak), was the chazzan for our small Jewish community in the Welsh valleys. He also worked underground in the coal mine (then called the pit) at Abertysswg, and later on the surface at the mine after he was injured in a pit explosion. The community rented a hall in the back of the Baptist church in Abertysswg for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur before the shul was built in Tredegar.

Names I remember from the community, with their city, town or village (as well as I can recollect) are: the Jacobs, New Tredegar and Cardiff; the Mazins, Rhymney; the Cohens, Rhymney; the Apters, Rhymney; and the Fines, Pontlottyn. There were others that I have forgotten. The father of Dr. Reuben Bellan (professor emeritus at the University of Manitoba) was in Abertysswg for some period of time, although I do not remember him.

My mother (née Weinbaum) had moved to Britain from Warsaw and later lost many family members in Europe during the Holocaust, as did my father. Also I had an aunt who lived on a farm just outside Cardiff. We often got produce from the farm, which helped us through the lean years.

Hezbollah's growing prominence in Lebanon

By LISA ARMONY
Special to The CJN

Following Israel's May 24 redeployment from the security zone in south Lebanon, Hezbollah quickly consolidated its hold on the area, filling the power vacuum created by the collapse of the South Lebanon Army (SLA) and the absence of Lebanese army troops.

With Syria preoccupied with the succession of Bashar al-Assad as president and the Lebanese government unable to take any major political or military steps without a Syrian directive, Hezbollah's hegemony in the south will likely remain unchallenged in the foreseeable future.

In light of these developments, two important questions are: What are Hezbollah's intentions? and What role will it seek to play now that one of its principal aims – the expulsion of Israeli forces from Lebanon – has been met?

Hezbollah Secretary General Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah has ordered his followers not to fire at Israeli targets until directed otherwise. Still, Nasrallah threatens to resume hostilities should Israel refuse to meet certain demands, including for the release of Lebanese detainees from Israeli jails, the cessation of alleged border violations and withdrawal from the disputed Sheba'a Farms in the eastern section of the former security zone (there has been some question about whether this area is Lebanese territory).

Nasrallah, it seems, is keeping the group's options open.

With Lebanese parliamentary elections scheduled to begin in late summer, he could lean towards the political option, keeping his forces at bay for now in his quest to gain a stronger foothold in Lebanese domestic politics. Prime Minister Ehud Barak has promised harsh reprisals in response to cross-border attacks. Such reprisals would harm Hezbollah's constituents in the south, and Hezbollah is sensitive to the possible backlash. The political scenario is therefore attractive in the short term.

Hezbollah holds seven seats in Lebanon's 128-member parliament. Nasrallah hopes to increase that number by capitalizing on the group's newly found prestige as the "liberator of national territory." He has stated that the group will now give greater attention to internal issues, and in a June 26 meeting with Lebanese President Emile Lahoud, discussed joint efforts to rehabilitate south Lebanon and the Bekaa Valley.

In the meantime, seeking to enhance its support in the predominantly Shi'a Muslim south, and in the absence of a $60-million (US) investment in the region promised by the Lebanese government, Hezbollah is taking other steps. Through its extensive network of hospitals, schools and social institutions, it continues to offer valuable services in this neglected region. It is also establishing mobile clinics, widening roads, renovating mosques and providing development loans and reconstruction aid.

Although these efforts are exclusively in the south, Hezbollah is increasingly seeking to portray itself as a Lebanese nationalist organization rather than a Shi'a sectarian group. Some of its leaders are tempering, at least publicly, the group's radical Islamic rhetoric, speaking instead in terms that embrace the entire Lebanese polity. For example, they have dubbed the IDF withdrawal a victory for "all Lebanese."

This new image can also be seen on the group's Web site, where the front page recently read: "The Sheba'a region is a part of Lebanon and will be liberated by Hezbollah; every inch of Lebanon needs to be free from occupation."

For the time being, no one in the Lebanese power structure appears willing or able to challenge Hezbollah, whether because Syria, the real power broker in Lebanon, has prevented such interference, or out of fear of Hezbollah reprisals. Hezbollah's growing political prominence is reflected not only in Nasrallah's talks with Lahoud – where the former was presented with a presidential medal in recognition of "the glory of [Hezbollah's] role" in liberating south Lebanon – but also in his unprecedented meeting with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan. The symbolic importance cannot be understated, for this unusual meeting between the head of the world's major peacekeeping institution and the leader of what is generally considered a terrorist organization gave Hezbollah tremendous credibility in the Arab world.

Hezbollah's other option is continued violence against Israel. Although its stated goal had been Israel's expulsion from the security zone, the organization in fact rejects Israel's existence and is committed to its destruction. Its political platform still reads: "The conflict with Israel is viewed as a central concern. This is not only limited to the IDF presence in Lebanon. Rather, the complete destruction of the State of Israel and the establishment of Islamic rule over Jerusalem is an expressed goal."

Even prior to the redeployment, Hezbollah leaders had claimed that an Israeli withdrawal would not yield an end to terrorist activity against "northern Palestine." Such statements have been reiterated in recent days: On Lebanon's Al-Manar TV, Nasrallah said: "Any Islamic movement or national Arab movement has to face up to the Zionist plan and work to liberate all territory and Palestine from the sea to the river."

And in rejection of Israeli peace initiatives, Hezbollah spiritual leader Muhammad Hussein Fadlallah proclaimed in his Friday sermon of June 9: "To preserve the victory, we ought to ensure that the enemy will not be able to achieve his goals through the negotiation of the peace process, that aim to control the country politically having failed to achieve this by its army." (Translation taken from Fadlallah's Web site.)

Clearly Hezbollah has no intention – nor did it ever have any intention – of disarming in the wake of the IDF departure. On the contrary, Israeli sources confirm that Hezbollah's military wing, Islamic Resistance, is continuing to receive highly sophisticated arms from Iran. There are also reports that Hezbollah terrorists have entered Israel several times to study the new IDF deployment along the border and the soldiers' daily routine. Israeli security sources believe that this action may be intended to facilitate the kidnapping of Israeli soldiers to be ransomed for the release of Hezbollah's Sheikh Karim Obeid and Amal leader Mustafa Dirani from Israeli administrative detention.

Opinions differ over what effect Hezbollah's use of violence would have on its pursuit of political power. Some argue that the effect would be detrimental. Renewed conflict could again drive the recently returned residents of south Lebanon out of their homes, causing them to withdraw their support for the militants. Moreover, even the threat of renewed warfare could diminish the limited support Hezbollah has in the country's Sunni, Druze and Christian communities. Others contend that anti-Israel violence could buttress Hezbollah's claim to be a national liberation movement. Images of Hezbollah fighters, and martyrs, confronting the "Zionist enemy" might engender sympathy and support among a population not yet resigned to living in peace with Israel. Hezbollah must weigh these possibilities carefully as it seeks to balance its desire for political power with its goal of destroying Israel.

Even if Hezbollah decides that domestic considerations demand that it temporarily rein in its own forces, it may continue its struggle against Israel by proxy through Palestinian Islamist forces in Lebanon. Hezbollah has already begun to strengthen its ties with groups such as Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad. This has given it greater influence among residents of the Palestinian refugee camps in southern Lebanon, many of whom reportedly oppose the agreements PA Chairman Yasser Arafat has reached with Israel, considering them a betrayal of their desire for the "right of return" to pre-1948 Israel.

This perception, combined with Lebanon's discriminatory treatment of the refugees, make these camps fertile ground for the cultivation of militant forces. Intelligence reports indicate that Hezbollah is now providing arms and military training to Palestinian guerrillas, and Hezbollah officials are openly calling on Palestinians to wage jihad (religious war) to force Israel to capitulate to their demands.

In the end, Hezbollah's fate may rest neither with the Lebanese electorate nor with its own leadership, but rather with its benefactors, Iran and Syria. Iran was instrumental in founding Hezbollah, which it sees as a spearhead in its battle against Israel. Hezbollah is deeply committed to Khomeinism and to transforming Lebanon into an Iranian-style Islamic republic. It is also fully subservient to the Iranian leadership, which provides it with ideological guidance, political and operational instructions, and military and financial aid. Iran's continued support for the export of radical Islam and its implacable opposition to Israel suggest that there will be no immediate change in its relationship with Hezbollah.

Syria, like Iran, has found it expedient to exploit Hezbollah to advance its objectives vis-a-vis Israel, particularly Israel's withdrawal from the entire Golan Heights. Damascus had used the group to continuously pressure Israel by encouraging Hezbollah to maintain its war against the IDF and SLA in the security zone, and by dictating to the group when to intensify or relax hostilities.

This was the reason that the late Syrian president Hafez al-Assad facilitated the provision of Hezbollah's military infrastructure, despite his apprehensions over the group's "Islamic project" in Lebanon and its close ties to Iran. Assad believed Hezbollah should be dismantled only within the framework of an agreement with Jerusalem in which Israel would return all of the Golan. He thus historically rejected the implementation of UN Resolution 425, which would imply the elimination of Hezbollah's military capabilities and an end to its terrorist activities in Lebanon.

With the death in June of Hafez al-Assad and the UN's acknowledgement of Israeli adherence to Resolution 425, it may be too soon to determine whether and how Syria's Hezbollah strategy will change. Thus while Israel hopes for continued calm on its northern frontier, it is preparing for the possibility of renewed hostilities.

Our most precious commodity

On my initial visit to Eretz Yisrael 65 years ago, I learned an important lesson on the very first night I spent there. I wanted to take a bath in my aunt's apartment, but was instructed to put no more than a few inches of water into the tub. I discovered at once that water was one of the country's most precious commodities – and it has remained so ever since.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

No wonder therefore that Syrian access to the Sea of Galilee is something the Israeli government does not want to concede – and not only for reasons of military security. The lake remains essential for Israel's physical survival – even as every human being is dependent on an adequate water supply.

Seventy percent of our physical structure consists of water, and most of us can survive no more than three days without it. Yet – so the Utne Reader informs me – the average household, with dishwasher, washing machine and a sprinkler system, uses 1,000 litres of water each day, while hundreds of millions of humans who belong to the poorest segment of their societies spend more for water than for anything else.

No wonder Israel has, for many decades, searched for ways and means not only of saving water but also of producing drinkable water from the sea. Some progress has been made, but not enough to be cost effective.

It is no accident that Jewish tradition places the very word mayim in a special category. Its life sustaining capacity is important, not only for our physical, but also for our spiritual survival, for in our tradition we use the words mayim chayim, living waters, as a synonym for Torah.

I therefore support the efforts of various Canadian organizations and individuals to remind ourselves that, while we are blessed with the largest sweet water resources on earth, they are not inexhaustible. The time to think about this is now. A booming economy produces some excesses, and waste seems to be an inevitable by-product. That may be all right in some areas, but it is not when it comes to water.

This not only makes good sense; it has a religious implication as well. We are put on earth, not to waste our resources, but to guard them as stewards and to make them available to future generations. Not only humans, but all existence depends on it. Scientific surveys show us that there has been a warming trend around the earth and that all water levels are diminishing by and by.

The Jews have been in the forefront of many activist programs designed to better our society. We can render a most significant service by making water conservation a societal priority on a private as well as public level. This is a truly Jewish thing to do.

What's in a president?

Amnon Danker, one of Israel's most acerbic political commentators, perhaps put it best: "No," he said, "They didn't steal the state away from us. Moshe Katsav's election as president was the symbolic expression of a lengthy process of social and political change that has been underway for years."

The commentary on Katsav's election to the largely ceremonial post has ranged from dismay to elation at the two ends of the Israeli political spectrum. The juxtaposition of Shimon Peres, part of Israel's founding aristocracy, statesman par excellence and Nobel laureate, with Katsav, a populist, observant politician of humble, immigrant origins, spawned strong reactions on the secular left and traditionalist right.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Katsav's victory, or rather Peres' defeat, were the result of political machinations that had more to do with current political developments than the merits of the two men. This is not unusual in presidential elections that are conducted in the Knesset by secret ballot. In this case, it was apparently the Shas vote that swung the result in Katsav's favour. Shas Knesset members voted against Peres and against Barak, with whom they are negotiating their re-entry into the government. This was yet another message to Barak that they cannot be taken for granted (although at this point Barak probably needs no such reminder).

Some would argue that Peres lost because he always does. One of the greatest visionaries in Israel has never been able to win an election. His team of campaign advisers was the same team that led him to the crushing defeat of 1996, and some of them had been at his side in earlier elections – and defeats. Only someone as seasoned as Peres in the art of elegant defeats could have the internal fortitude to bounce right back and say that he never looks back.

Peres' defeat certainly deprived Israel of a unique voice on the international stage in the highest office the country can offer. Of past presidents, only Chaim Herzog enjoyed similar international stature. As Israel's president, Peres would undoubtedly have been welcomed by every world leader, many of whom he already knows well. He would have been a forceful, clarion voice for peace. Domestically, he – like no other – would have called on Israelis to rise to the challenge that peace brings to their identity and history.

But Danker was probably closer to the truth – and he was not alone. A few commentators provided a sober, more balanced perspective. Katsav does, indeed, represent the "new Israel," which carries historic grievances against the founding generation, and is looking for symbolic and real manifestations of its rightful place in the blazing Israeli sun. In turn, the "old elites," who feel overpowered by the traditional, Mizrachi (Sephardi) immigrants and Orthodox communities, have repeatedly reacted extremely and vehemently against what they see as a takeover of their natural turf. As a result, they could not even acknowledge the pride that overflowed in the development town of Kiryat Malachi at the success of its native son. They also could not appreciate the significance of the statement by Knesset speaker Avraham Burg that this election erased the glass wall that had existed between "one of ours" and "one of them."

The position of president is ceremonial and strictly apolitical, especially in the new electoral system that elects the prime minister directly. But each president has made his mark, for better or worse. Most importantly, the president can provide moral leadership in a barren landscape in this respect.

Ezer Weizman, who endeared himself to many with his devotion to bereaved families, and angered many with his "shoot from the hip" style, resigned under a cloud that marred the moral stature of the office.

Moshe Katsav will have the challenge of proving that he is indeed a president for all of Israel's citizens. He may also be better poised than anyone else to take on the monumental task of creating bridges and dialogue in a country that is more divided and fragmented than ever before. In Israel, the "new multiculturalism" has become a poor excuse for polarization, hatred of the "other," and narrow political interests. President Katsav may not be up to the challenge, but I pray that he does not flinch from taking it on.

Hillary, Stock and anti-Semitism

In recent weeks, Jews in the United States and Canada have been wrestling with the possibility that a major political leader might, in some way, be an anti-Semite.

In the United States, the politician was none other than Hillary Clinton. According to a recent tell-all book, in 1974 she called her husband's Arkansas campaign manager a "f…ing Jew bastard." Bill had just lost an election, tempers were very short, and she allegedly snapped. The fact that the campaign manager in fact had only very distant Jewish relatives and was raised as a Baptist, is an amusing sidebar.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

All sorts of FoBs and FoHs (friends of Bill and Hillary) as well as Jewish leaders rallied to her defence. There was a concerted effort to impugn the integrity of the campaign manager and other witnesses. Certainly that kind of ethnic slur is not expected from the hyper-politically correct Hillary.

But for a minute, let us suppose that she said it. We all say things in the heat of the moment. So what? How important is an ethnic slur as an indicator of anti-Semitism? Jews use ethnic slurs about non-Jews all the time. During heated arguments Jews have uttered the term "f…ing goy," I am sure.

Hugo Black was a youthful member of the Ku Klux Klan before he became a liberal Supreme Court justice. Richard Nixon was a consistent verbal anti-Semite, as revealed on the Nixon tapes. But he also was the patron of Henry Kissinger, and had other Jewish advisers. Actions – and recent actions – always speak louder than words. A single epithet blurted in anger does not, in my book, make one a serious anti-Semite. Anti-Semites are people who actually harm Jews or deliberately hurt Jewish interests. Hillary may have many character flaws, but anti-Semitism is not one of them.

Well how about Stockwell Day? At the time of his victory over Preston Manning, newspapers were full of accounts linking him to the phrase, "Jews were the children of the devil," or some version thereof. Well, it turns out he did not actually say that. But parts of an evangelical Christian curriculum used in Alberta schools he directed included, apparently, some sentiments along those lines.

Does that make him an anti-Semite? In a sense, any fundamentalist or evangelical Christian might be considered an anti-Semite. For some of these types of devout Christians, the only route to salvation is accepting Jesus Christ. A Nazi war criminal who does so goes to heaven; a Jew, no matter how nice a person, goes to hell – where they hang around with the devil.

People are entitled to their private religious views. What matters in the Day case would be any spillover from those private views into the realm of governance or policy. Certainly there are some who move in rural Alberta evangelical circles whose views on all manner of social issues – à la Keegstra – are unacceptable, and would be harmful if ever turned into law. Day has had very little contact with Jews or other minorities over the past few years. Urban Canada is not rural Alberta.

So Day will be watched closely, and rightly so. But politics makes strange bedfellows. Day supports government funding for religious schools, and a few ultra-Orthodox Jews in Ontario might be prepared to ignore the allegations of anti-Semitism and support the Alliance, to help get funding for Jewish day schools.

The gratifying thing is that there is almost no constituency for political anti-Semitism in Canada or the United States. While polls show that some Canadians – usually in single digits – say they would not vote for Jews, the reality has been different. Jewish politicians like Herb Gray from Windsor or Dave Barrett in British Columbia built successful careers with very few Jewish votes. On the issue of political anti-Semitism, North America is not the Old Country, it is the New World.

Right-wing extremists torn by disunity

Right-wing extremism, with its intimations of xenophobia and racism, is always a cause for concern. But when it asserts itself in a country like Germany, where the Holocaust was conceived and planned, the angst is all the more pronounced.

According to official figures, there are 134 radical right-wing organizations – including 49 neo-Nazi groups – in Germany, with a combined membership is 53,600. However, the Office for the Protection of the Constitution, a federal intelligence agency which tracks extremists, believes that 514,000 Germans are sympathetic to extreme far-right causes. Interior Minister Otto Schily said recently that these groups "continue to fight the fundamental values and institutions of our democracy and hence endanger public security in Germany."

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

The total number of criminal offences inspired by right-wing extremism, including the distribution of anti-Semitic material and the display of Nazi symbols, reached 10,037 in 1999, a decline of nine percent since 1998. Soldiers, mainly recruits, have been among the perpetrators.

Incidents of right-wing extremist violence, which have claimed the lives of more than 100 people since 1990, are usually aimed at visible minorities, primarily asylum seekers and new immigrants. Late last month, nine immigrants, among them six Soviet Jews, were injured when a bomb, believed to have been planted by racists, went off in Dusseldorf. The police are investigating the incident.

This kind of violence, which peaked eight years ago, has fallen considerably since then. In 1992, the ministry of interior recorded 2,277 such incidents, compared to 708 in 1998 and 746 last year. Schily has warned that right-wing extremists are increasingly ready to use violence, but points out that there are no terrorist structures.

Those most likely to resort to violence are the estimated 2,000 neo-Nazis and the 9,000 skinheads. The majority of them are under the age of 20 and live in eastern Germany, wracked by high levels of unemployment, said Cordula Pingel-Kiessling, an official in the Berlin headquarters of the ministry of interior.

Extreme right-wing attitudes are, in part, shaped or reinforced by skinhead rock bands, of which there were 93 in 1999. Yet the Internet is increasingly important in drawing recruits. Extremists currently run 330 home pages on the Net. Heinz Fromm, the president of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution, has said that Internet sites have made it easier for racists to disseminate their message.

Neo-Nazis have grown more brazen of late. In January, hundreds marched through Berlin's Brandenburg Gate – a symbol of the new, democratic Germany – in a protest against a plan to build a national Holocaust memorial in the centre of the city. In February, hundreds assembled in Magdeburg's cathedral square chanting "Glory and honour to the Waffen SS."

Pingel-Kiessling distinguishes between neo-Nazis, who wish to build a state modelled on Adolf Hitler's Third Reich, and members of three legal extreme right-wing political parties which contest elections and currently hold seats in four of Germany's 16 states, but none in the federal parliament.

The most successful of them, the Munich-based German People's party (DVU), has a membership of about 17,000 and is led by publisher Gerhard Frey, who has ties with Toronto propagandist Ernst Zundel. Frey's newspaper, the Deutsche Nationale Zeitung, has a supposed circulation of 120,000. In April 1998, the DVU captured a seat in Saxony-Anhalt, and in June and September 1999, it won re-election in Bremen and broke through in Brandenburg.

The Republicans, with Rolf Schlierer at the helm, have a seat in Baden-Wurttemburg. The Republicans rose to prominence in 1989, gaining representation in Berlin's city senate and a seat in the European Parliament for its founder, Franz Schonhuber. In 1993, the Republicans won a seat in the state of Hesse. Schlierer, who succeeded Schonhuber in 1994, is a lawyer and a doctor. He denies that he is an extremist. At present, the Republicans have 14,000 members.

Cordula Pingel-Kiessling

The National Democratic party (NDP), with 6,000 members, is under the leadership of Udo Voigt, and is most closely identified with neo-Nazis, observed Pingel-Kiessling. The NDP has organized demonstrations in which neo-Nazis and skinheads accounted for the bulk of the participants. It has yet to win parliamentary representation.

All three of these parties are anti-Semitic, she claimed. The NDP, though, promotes Holocaust denial, a criminal offence in Germany, and wishes to resurrect Germany's pre-1939 borders.

Torn by personal and ideological rivalries, the extreme right is dogged by disunity and lacks a charismatic leader. "Germany has no Le Pen," said Pingel-Kiessling, referring to French right-wing leader Jean-Marie Le Pen. If the DVU, Republicans and NDP unite, they could win more seats in state parliaments, she said.

Since 1992, Germany has banned 12 neo-Nazi organizations, writes Jan Herman Brinks in his newly-published book, Children of a New Fatherland: Germany's Post-War Right-Wing Politics (I.B. Tauris). And now there is speculation that the NDP will be banned as well. The government has taken steps to combat extreme right-wingers, but last week Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder promised to adopt further measures.

Hans Mommsen, a retired historian whose speciality is the Nazi period, believes that extreme rightists are "weaker in Germany than in France or Britain. It's not a very significant movement here, and they have no chance to elect representatives to the Bundestag" (the national parliament).

Still, as Berlin Jewish community leader Moishe Waks said, "We have to take these people seriously and punish them very hard."

Anti-Semitism in Germany

Although anti-Semitism is rarely a factor in the daily lives of Jews in Germany, its effects are still devastating. When a synagogue is attacked or a Jewish cemetery is pillaged, horrific images of the Third Reich naturally come to mind. Yet, judging by scientific surveys, Germans are no more anti-Semitic than other Europeans, said Juliane Wetzel, a researcher at the Centre for Research on Anti-Semitism at the Technical University in Berlin.

Juliane Wetzel

The data she has studied suggests that 12 to 14 percent of Germans are anti-Semitic. In a 1999 poll, Die Woche, a weekly magazine, claimed that one in five Germans harbour anti-Jewish attitudes.

In the past two years, a series of anti-Semitic incidents have awakened Germans to this perennial problem.

In December 1998, a bomb destroyed the gravestone of Heinz Galinski, the former president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. In April and October 1999, two major Jewish cemeteries in Berlin and Nuremberg were desecrated. Last year, 47 Jewish cemeteries were desecrated, as compared to 40 in 1995. (During the first five years of German reunification from1990 onward, more Jewish cemeteries were vandalized than during the entire Weimar Republic). Last April, in the first incident of its kind in Germany since 1994, a synagogue in the Thuringian city of Erfurt was damaged by a Molotov cocktail.

Four major waves of anti-Semitism have swept over western Germany since the end of World War II, noted Wetzel. The most recent one took place in the wake of reunification; the others in 1959, 1965 and 1983.

Wetzel, 43, claims that older Germans are not more anti-Semitic than younger Germans. But age-old stereotypes about Jews persist, even though most Germans will never meet a Jew, said Annette Haller, managing director of Cologne's Germanica-Judaica, the largest library of its kind in Europe.

"Germans are xenophobic," said Susan Stern, a 56-year-old British writer who has lived in Germany for three decades.

"Jews are still an enigma for Germans," observed Salomon Korn, 56, the president of Frankfurt's Jewish community. "But I have never personally felt anti-Semitism," said Korn, who has just written a book about German-Jewish relations.

Jewish Life

The Orthodox Jew

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Recently, I have found the news reports from the United States to be somewhat disturbing. Vice-President Al Gore has selected his running-mate for the upcoming presidential election and he selected a Jewish senator.

It was not Gore's choice that disturbed me, it was the way in which I repeatedly heard it announced. Apparently, according to several U.S. radio and television networks, Gore had selected an Orthodox Jew. Upon hearing the news, I was overcome with two distinct emotions: anger and sadness.

My response was not directed at Al Gore, nor at the media, but at the Jewish world of which I find myself a part. I realized that it was not enough to designate Senator Lieberman as a Jew, but that it was important to designate him as an Orthodox Jew.

Somehow the implication was that being Orthodox would have a greater influence on Lieberman's political objectivity than if he were "merely" a Jew. The innuendo was clear that if he were a Conservative or a Reform Jew, the average person might not be as bothered by it; an Orthodox Jew was another matter.

In fact, I wondered if the media would have ascribed a label to him such as "Conservative" or "Reform" or would they merely have mentioned him as a Jew? I found it interesting that none of the reports found it necessary to define what an "Orthodox Jew" was, but immediately commented on its significance.

One commentator went so far as to advise Lieberman that he quickly set aside his Orthodoxy and pronounce a disclaimer – as did John F. Kennedy – and separate his religion from his politics. I took it all in and I became angry.

Then I began to wonder at how much the media take for granted. The media feel that categories of Jews don't need definitions – it is assumed that the average American would understand. There seems to be an accepted notion that being an Orthodox Jew is different than simply being a Jew.

Where did these assumptions come from? How did they become so widespread? These ideas could only come from the Jewish community itself. In that instant, the news media held a mirror up to world Jewry and the reflection was shocking. We have taught the world well. We have told them through our behaviour that there is no longer such a thing as a Jew – now there are categories. We have built internal walls and it is clear that they have become high enough for all to see.

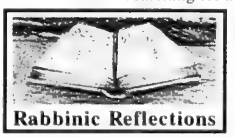
I took it all in and sadness swept over me.

Throughout our literature the rabbis have told us time and again that we are all Jews and if there is a distinction to be made, it must be one based on piety.

Perhaps one day we should change our language and think of people as being righteous or not, regardless of community affiliation. Perhaps it should be today. In the midrashic text, Sifre, this thought thunders in its simplicity: "Do not be of many groupings, be of one."

'No name' Judaism

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN



I remember when "no name" products began to proliferate in Toronto. I was thrilled. Finally, a challenge to brand-name loyalty! I found it a relief to buy a product based on the content itself, rather than on the company logo. Sometimes I wonder what Judaism would be like if our denominational "brand-name" labels like Reform, Orthodox, Reconstructionist, Conservative, came second to the product itself, our Judaism.

It is fashionable to toss around the word "pluralism," to claim that this institution or that one in our community is truly "pluralistic."

True pluralism is not another label; rather, it is the deeply held belief that each of the movements, with all its strengths and weaknesses, plays a valuable role in the ongoing continuity, survival and ultimate creativity of the Jewish people. It is the practice of participating in and learning from the spectrum of ways to be Jewish. It is the stretching of personal comfort zones and communal boundaries to compromise on all sides, so that everyone fits under one umbrella while still carrying his or her own umbrella. True pluralism is not easy; it makes you rethink your rules, hold fast to your principles, while searching for a way of being together that honours each individually held ideology.

The most beautiful example I can offer is a U.S. conference I was invited to as a keynote speaker. The theme was "Jewish unity" and a Reform, Orthodox and Conservative rabbi shared the podium for the opening panel. It took place on Shabbat evening, preceded by a Kabalat Shabbat service. Divided by denomination, of course. In a conference on Jewish unity!

The three rabbis held a meeting, and struggled over what it would take to create one joint service. We entered the discussion with a desire to worship together in a way that respected the needs of both the traditional and the liberal participants. For example, we would have to find a balance between separate seating and mixed seating. We agreed upon a service with mixed seating in the middle, separate seating on the two sides, women leading the non-halachic parts of the service and men leading the halachic parts. A compromise for both sides? Yes indeed. A growing, learning experience? Yes indeed.Comfortable for everyone? Of course not.

Nothing that makes you grow, makes you stretch, makes you reach beyond where you are now is ever totally comfortable. But surely Jewish pluralism is not a code word for "everyone is invited to come and share in our one, right way of doing things."

This is not to say that adherence to a denomination is wrong, or narrow.

Quite the opposite. We need some labels or we will be groundless. As Lionel Trilling once wrote, "Some people are so open-minded that their brains fall out." There is a value to having boundaries, ideologies, principles, shared communal expectations. But pluralism is, like no-name products, a challenge to brand-name loyalty, and as such, it forces us to re-evaluate the content of our Judaism, not just its form.

Yishar koach

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, another in my occasional salutes to Jewish Web sites that are just a little bit different and don't fall into neat categories. To the people behind them, I wish you a Yishar koach!

Many rabbis share their wisdom at their Web sites. But how many share software? That's what Rabbi Moshe ben Asher has done at the GatherThePeople Web site [http://www.gatherthepeople.org]. The rabbi's database is a complete set of database templates for PCs and compatible computers. The rabbi developed them for record-keeping of contacts with congregants, including their births, conversions, b'nai mitzvah, weddings, counselling, sick visits, divorces, funerals, and Yizkor memorial dates. The templates work with Lotus Smartsuite software which must be purchased separately [http://www.lotus.com/home.nsf/welcome/smartsuite]. There is a great deal at the Web site including divrei Torah and articles on community building.

There are many fine Web sites that deal with various aspects of life for survivors of the Holocaust and their families. One of the best is If Not Now produced by the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto [http://baycrest.org/ifnotnow.html]. Some of the thought-provoking articles include A Holistic Approach in Working with Holocaust Survivors and As Our Parents Age: Thoughts of a Daughter of Survivors. But what I also like about the site is that there is also a place for poetry. In Remembering Sophie, a granddaughter reflects on the memory of a grandmother she last saw 60 years ago – and on what will happen when she is no longer around to carry those memories.

Who needs Sam Spade when you could have Rabbi David Small by your side? Small is the star of the series of detective novels which include Friday the Rabbi Slept Late and Saturday the Rabbi Went Hungry. He's also one of the heroes of Daphne Schor, creator of the Jewish whodunit Web site [http://www.jwhodunit.com/].

Daphne loves a good murder novel but she loves it even more when the detective is Jewish and the story touches on Jewish food, dress and themes. As she points out in her Web site, "Readers of an Agatha Christie novel ponder the meaning of roast beef and a pot of mustard on the murdered Lady Worthington's breakfast tray. Readers of a Jewish mystery ponder the post-mortem finding of a cheese-steak sandwich in the stomach of a man believed to be an Orthodox rabbi. They're an excellent way to learn about a different world view or to explore one's own culture more deeply."

One of the great things about the Internet is the ability for people with very specific needs and backgrounds to seek each other out and form a community. HUCKids is an e-mail list for "rabbis', cantors' and educators' kids [ages 12 and up] to get to know each other and discuss the needs and issues of being a child of a leader in a Reform congregation." If you are a HUCKid (which I assume stands for Hebrew Union College Kid) then they're waiting to hear from you at the Shamash e-mail list page [http://shamash.org/listform.html].

Tired of chicken? Sick of salmon? Well, there is an alternative according to the folks at KosherBison.com [http://kosherbison.com/].

KosherBison.com is located in South Dakota and is using the Internet to spread the word about its low cholesterol, glatt kosher product. And what to do with your kosher bison once you get it through the door? No problem. The Web site has recipes for Bison Chili, Bison Shoulder Roast and, of course, Bison Cholent. Yishar koach!

Understanding God's rationale

In his weekly sermon on Aug. 5, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the spiritual leader of Israel's Orthodox Shas party, said that the Jews murdered in the Holocaust were the reincarnated souls of sinners. Following is a response by Rabbi Mikhael Dahan of Montreal to Rabbi Yosef's comments.

Guest Voice

By RABBI MIKHAEL DAHAN

Member of Knesset Tommy Lapid was right in stating that Rabbi Ovadia Yosef's interpretation of the Holocaust in his weekly nationwide radio broadcast "has given support to Hitler's view that the Jews were sinful." I must agree, for once, with Prime Minister Ehud Barak's assertion that these remarks "are liable to harm the memory of those who died."

Many great men have attempted to clarify the mystery of the Holocaust, and after all the answers offered, it remains clear that none of our great Torah sages can stand up and declare: "I know the reason for this tragedy."

Indeed, all of us believe that "God is righteous and just," but understand? – we cannot! Knowledge of Divine rationale is beyond human grasp. Tragedy can be for reasons known to God alone, because it is not always a result of the sins of the people.

Unfortunately, Rabbi Yosef is not the first to suggest that God records the sins of the Jewish nation until they accumulate to such a peak that He unleashes His wrath and punishes them. Although Jews do believe in the concept of reward and punishment, it is not feasible to say that this tragedy occurred "to atone for the misdeeds of the reincarnated sinners," as suggested in the rabbi's sermon.

When considering the annihilation of six million Jews in the most barbaric and cruel fashion possible, it is unthinkable to assume that this destruction came about as punishment for bad conduct. Indeed Satan himself would be unable to devise a list of sins worthy of such an awesome atrocity.

On the contrary, to say anything negative about the six million, after the fact, is blasphemy and a desecration of their souls.

Rabbi Yosef surely knows that since they died for no reason other than simply being Jewish, then according to Jewish law, they are regarded as saints. Our sages say that before entering Paradise all souls must go through a purification process, with the exception of those saints who were killed for the single fact that they were Jews.

Upon reflection, we cannot deny that God did afflict us. To view Jewish history as a chain of chance occurrences is untenable; it flies in the face of rational historic interpretation. Is it mere coincidence that only the Jewish people has been persecuted so unceasingly, and nonetheless has outlived all the peoples that have persecuted it? Yet, no reason exists within the realm of human comprehension beyond the fact that it was a Divine decree.

It is therefore pointless to even begin to look for rational reasons as to why the Holocaust happened, for God's way defies the understanding of humankind, even that of Israel's leading political rabbi.

Rabbi Mikhael Dahan is a professor of religion and humanities at College Marie Victorin in Montreal.

Tobe clan set to hold first reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There are more than 600 people listed on the Tobe family's Web site.

On the weekend of Aug. 18, some 200 family members from across Canada, the United States, Great Britain and possibly Switzerland will gather in Toronto for the first Tobe Family Reunion.

They are descendants of Moishe David (1835-1895) and Sarah Tobe (1837-1910) of Plonsk, Poland. Moishe and Sarah were married in 1855 and had eight children; one died before the war, four died in the Holocaust.

The family members who left Poland include Dora Tobe Landau, Shlomo Tobe, Arya Leib Tobe, and three children of Mindel who died in the Holocaust. Today, the Tobe family counts seven generations.

Marilyn Platnick Glass, one of the organizers of the reunion says the weekend will begin with a Shabbat dinner and conclude with a Sunday brunch at the Ontario Science Centre. There will be activities for the children, a picnic, entertainment by members of the Tobe family, recording of reminiscences and family pictures.

The North American and British branches of the family were reconnected when cousins, David Tobe of England and Kelly Gollish from Toronto were stationed in London, England, during World War II.

Glass told The CJN that the idea of bringing the family together emerged a year ago when Larry Schwartz of Detroit met Gwen Ison of Toronto at a synagogue service in Israel. After a brief conversation, the cousins realized that many in the family did not know each other.

On their return to their homes, they contacted other members of the family, established a Web site at www.tobefamily.com, and formed a planning and organizing committee headed by Glass, Joan Tobe and Gittie Gollish.

"My grandmother Dora was the first in the family to arrive in Canada just after the turn of the century," Glass says."My grandparents opened a restaurant."

Later came Dora's brother Shlomo and his son Sam, who bought a farm at Niagara-on-the-Lake in 1926. Sam's brother Jack later opened a tree nursery, also in Niagara-on-the-Lake. They were one of three Jewish families residing in the area at that time, Glass says.

The committee located some relatives on the genealogy Web site; others saw ads in the Jewish newspapers in England and Switzerland. The family are looking for Tobe relatives from Plonsk.

Glass notes that the original family name, Taub or Taube was changed to Tobe by an immigration officer.

Jewish Learning Centre revitalizes its programs

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Learning Centre has moved to the Jewish Public Library in the Lipa Green building. Rabbi Daniel Bahar, founder of the centre, believes the move will benefit both.

The JLC has a convenient, comfortable base for its social and educational activities, and the library gets more exposure and use, the rabbi explained.

Rabbi Bahar is excited about marking the revitalization of his program with a "Music and Friends Concert," to be held at the Sephardic Kehila Centre on Aug. 19, at 10 p.m.

For a $5 cover charge, young adults can enjoy Ronnie Wiseman, "the king of Jewish reggae," and light refreshments.

Rabbi Daniel Bahar

In a time where, Rabbi Bahar believes, the environment for young people is unhealthy, the former youth director at Shaarei Shomayim and Chabad @ Flamingo wants to create "healthy programming."

"There is not too much being done for kids – that is why they are hanging out in parks," he said.

His intention is to bring Jewish kids together and make being in a Jewish environment fun.

The rabbi is excited about several new programs he has developed. One is beginners Hebrew for junior high and high school students, to be taught by high school kids. Not only will this make the kids more comfortable coming, the rabbi explained, but will help the teachers develop into leaders.

Another program will teach grade 9 and 10 youngsters how to design their own Web site.

Levi Moskoff, age 5, enjoys arts and crafts at the Jewish Learning Centre.

There is also Reading Genius, a multi-media course in speed reading.

He and his wife Esther recently ran an arts and crafts and storytelling afternoon for children from three to six. Volunteer Hadassah Henig read stories on Jewish themes, and then the kids made imaginative crafts about them.

Rabbi Bahar also organizes trips to such places as LaserQuest. In the past, he has taken children fishing and on retreats.

For young adults, he hopes to have a coffee house at his home once a month.

"I try to give the personal touch," he said.

For more information about the concert or the centre, call 416-TAP-JYLC (416-827-5952).

CJC pilot project settles disputes over the phone

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some disputes within the Jewish community have been settled over the phone.

This has surprised and encouraged Sharon Wolfe, who is chair of the Jewish Mediation Services of Ontario (JMSO), a pilot project of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

"We're successful in bringing the parties to the table 50 percent of the time, but in some of the cases we help the parties solve the matter without going to court or meeting face to face," she said.

If the cases cannot be settled by a face-to-face meeting, they can go on to be heard by a list of qualified mediators. In one year, it has been so successful that the program may be expanded to other regions of Canada, Wolfe said.

If the case goes to mediation, there is a charge of $200 to each party, $150 for a three-hour session with the mediator, and $50 to support the program.

Mediators have been established in other parts of Ontario, but no issues from these areas have yet come forward.

"We don't deal with family matters or divorces, or with halachic issues," said Wolfe.

"We have heard from everyone concerned that they are satisfied with the results," she added.

All aspects of each case are confidential, Wolfe said, and any inquiries should be directed to 416-635-2883, ext. 112.

The JMSO board of directors includes Rabbi Phillip Scheim, Rabbi Moshe Stern, Charles Harnick, Cliff Hendler, Paul Perall, Fred Kaufman, Rose Wolfe and Rhoda Eisenstadt. Ben Zarnett is honorary legal counsel.

Scholarship winner plans to work with terminal and AIDS patients

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a tough job, but Eden Rosen wants to care for patients who are dying of AIDS and other illnesses.

Eden Rosen

The 23-year-old social work student was recently awarded a scholarship that will allow her to do just that during her upcoming second year at Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work in New York.

In an interview at her parents' home during a recent visit to Toronto, Rosen spoke of her gratitude for the scholarship in memory of Peter Krueger, who died of AIDS.

"It really is an honour to be carrying on the name of someone who meant so much to a family. It's something I don't take lightly," she said, referring also to her feelings about the Stephen Cooper memorial scholarship she received last year at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

In a 1999 CJN interview, Rosen said she would like to return to Toronto after completing her education, to serve the needs of AIDS patients in the Jewish community.

But in her interview for the scholarship this year, she was initially discouraged from accepting the position (and, in effect, from accepting the scholarship) in the home care hospice program run through the Peter Krueger Centre for Immunological Disorders at Beth Israel Medical Centre. She was told that many students find they can't deal with the placement.

Rosen, however, had the confidence to plead her case, backed by solid volunteer experience in the area and newly acquired skills reflected in her 4.0 grade point average.

As an undergraduate at the University of Western Ontario, she took a thanatology (death and dying) course, and also worked in Toronto as a Jewish Hospice Program volunteer, at two hospital palliative care units, and at a hospice catering to AIDS patients.

"Just because something might be intimidating or sad is no reason for me to shy away from it," she said. "I have the ability to take care of people and deal with the impact of somebody close to me dying, and move on...Although the end result might be traumatic and extremely sad, the work you do to get there is worth it."

This year she expects to provide therapy and comfort to about half a dozen clients and their families, in consultation with their medical professionals.

Despite Rosen's choice to deal with so much pain and sadness, her smile is frequent and sunny, and she practically bubbles with enthusiasm when she talks about her studies.

"I work very hard, but I love it. I love doing the papers. I love working till 1 or 2 [in the morning]."

She also loves the cultural diversity of New York, and the intimacy of the small school, where she has become involved in student government, gotten to know and admire her professors, and spoken to visitors at open houses.

In addition to her course work, Rosen spent part of her first year doing a placement at the Jewish Home and Hospital in the Bronx. There she provided individual counselling and implemented three support groups – two for senior residents losing their vision due to macular degeneration, and one for men dealing with issues such as bereavement and being a caregiver.

This summer, Rosen is an intern at the Office of Domestic Violence Emergency Intervention Services at Human Resources Administration of New York City. She finds she loves the job, her first experience in a non-clinical setting.

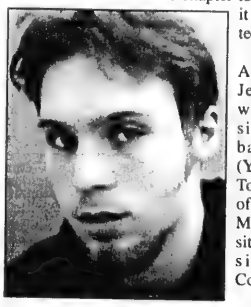
Among other duties, she trains welfare recipients in job-related skills, and is involved in planning a conference on the effects of domestic violence on children.

Because of her wide-ranging experience this year, Rosen has discovered a number of new interests. "There are a lot of things I want to do," she said. "I'm only 23...I think that's an advantage."

Ryerson AEPi chapter in works

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the past two years, Jack Gryn has been a student at Ryerson Polytechnic University, but a member of Eta Pi, the AEPi fraternity chapter at York University.



Jack Gryn

Now the 20-year-old computer science student is working on starting a chapter at Ryerson. Three of his Ryerson peers are also in the York chapter.

"It's just a matter of getting a few more people and getting things organized," he told The CJN recently. To the best of Gryn's knowledge, this would be the first fraternity at Ryerson.

He has identified about a dozen potential members so far, but figures it will be easier to get the project off the ground once classes begin Sept. 5. For the chapter to be viable, he said, it needs 10 committed people.

AEPi is North America's largest Jewish fraternity, with 105 chapters, six of which are based in Canada (York, University of Toronto, University of Western Ontario, McMaster University and the University of British Columbia.)

Gryn is also serving as president of Ryerson's Jewish Student Association (JSA) for the 2000/2001 year. Whether he would serve as "master" of the new chapter depends on election results once the chapter is formed. It is estimated the school has over 1,000 Jewish students.

He sees AEPi as offering a smaller, more closely knit group, that would work with its counterparts at York and the University of Toronto. Its emphasis would be on social events and philanthropy.

Gryn's goals regarding the JSA include letting more people know the organization exists and that it is there to serve them as a social outlet and to address issues such as exams on Saturday, which have arisen in the past. "People have to know they have a right to choose to write the exams on another day," he said.

To contact Gryn about Ryerson's AEPi or JSA, e-mail jgryn@aepi.dhs.org or jsa@acs.ryerson.ca.

For students on any campus who would like more information about AEPi, register on the Web at www.aepi.dhs.org/rush.

Million-dollar estate may be lost to charities over will dispute

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's auditor-general has agreed to look into the case of a woman who did not sign her will, but allegedly asked for her estate, estimated at $1-million, to be left to the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) and the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), as well as two other hospitals.

According to court testimony by JGH social worker Sharon Freedman, Bertha Kellner Stowasser, who died recently at age 79 at the JGH, stated on at least two occasions that her estate should be divided among the NCJW for a planned palliative-care hospice, the JGH, as well as the Montreal Children's Hospital and Shriners' Hospital.

Stowasser, a widow with no known heirs, did not sign the will because her notary, Abraham Polger, decided he could not accept her signature due to her poor health.

The woman's estate is now being held by the Public Curator and will be turned over to the state after 10 years, if no legitimate claims are made on it. Much of her wealth was in properties, which have since been sold by the Public Curator.

While the unsigned will has no legal validity, Ura Greenbaum, the head of the Association pour la Défense des Personnes et Biens sous Curatelle Publique, a private organization that deals with complaints against the Public Curator, wrote to the auditor general and provincial ombudsman, stating that at least part of the estate should go to the charities "on moral and humanitarian grounds."

The charities have also tried to persuade the government that some money should go to their causes.

Gilles Boulianne, attache to Auditor General Guy Breton, wrote back to Greenbaum saying, "We are taking good note of the facts mentioned in your letter, and if observations or recommendations result from our audit work, they will be communicated to the National Assembly through our annual report."

Provincial ombudsman Daniel Jacoby has not replied to Greenbaum's letter.

Freedman testified that Stowasser was deemed mentally competent by JGH doctors after she entered the JGH May 31, 1999. Stowasser complained to hospital staff that she feared two men were taking advantage of her financially.

Freedman advised her to get a notary to help put her assets in order and to draw up a will.

During her first meeting with Polger June 18, 1999, Stowasser named the four charities she wanted as beneficiaries. These wishes were reiterated at a second meeting at her home July 2.

The NCJW project was suggested by Freedman to Stowasser, when she could not think of another charity. The NCJW has been trying to open an AIDS hospice, called Chesed House, for about five years.

She was re-admitted to the JGH shortly thereafter, but improved enough that her discharge was being planned. On July 5, Polger came to the JGH with the will for signing, just as Stowasser's health took a sudden turn for the worse.

Two days earlier, it later came out in court, a man (one of the persons she had claimed took advantage of her financially) came to the JGH with a will naming himself and another man Stowasser's heirs and, according to testimony by Freedman, "forced" her to sign it. Stowasser was legally blind.

Quebec Superior Court Judge Claude Larouche refused to probate this will.

"In every way, Mrs. Stowasser fulfilled the requirements of making a will, except for a technicality, and that is that the notary was too ethical to take her signature because of her state. She had made her intentions very, very clear to the notary before that. I was a witness," Freedman told The CJN.

Freedman, who has been a social worker at the JGH for 22 years, said this case dramatically illustrates the necessity of having – well before your health declines – a legal will and a mandate, which names a person who can make health care and financial decisions on your behalf if you become incapacitated.

She added it also should remind professionals, as well as the public, to be alert of signs of elder abuse, which can take many forms, besides physical harm.

Greenbaum, who was a lawyer, said the charities may have more than a moral argument.

"Article 48 of the Quebec human rights charter prohibits any form of exploitation of elderly or handicapped persons. The charter overrides the Civil Code, which governs the making of wills. It could be argued that the Public Curator is violating that article by not respecting Mrs. Stowasser's wishes," Greenbaum said.

KlezKanada back for 5th year

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Now in its fifth year, KlezKanada has gained an international reputation among lovers of klezmer music and Yiddish culture, said its founder and chief driving force, Hy Goldman.

Participants this year can expect "a spectacular all-star festival," he said.

"It's a testimony to the continued vitality and creativity of the culture born in eastern Europe."

This year's all-time high registration and the calibre of the faculty make KlezKanada "the premier event of its kind," Goldman said. He devotes much of his time outside of being a physician to the organization of KlezKanada.

This year's version will be held as always at Camp B'nai Brith, 60 miles north of Montreal, from Aug. 23 to 27.

That's five days of music, both in the form of concerts and informal jamming that goes into the wee hours of the morning. There are also lectures and discussions, films, and instrumental workshops.

Close to 400 people from Canada, the United States, Europe and elsewhere have registered. They range from serious musicians to those who simply like to soak up the culture of their forefathers, all the while in a rustic Laurentian setting. All ages show up and there are programs for children and teens.

Participants are housed in accommodations ranging from tents and cabins to the camp's hotel-like retreat centre. The overflow ends up at nearby motels.

Among the names on the faculty this year are: Mina Bern, a legendary Yiddish actress who began her career in pre-war Lodz, Poland and is still performing with the Folksbiene Yiddish Theatre in New York; Brave Old World, an American quartet that gives a modern twist to traditional klezmer; a clarinet team of Kurt Bjorling, German Goldenshteyn, David Krakauer and Merlin Sheperd; violinist Deborah Strauss of the Klezmer Conservatory Band and Chicago Klezmer Ensemble; and Khevrisa, a new klezmer group that plays violin-led instrumentals from 19th-century eastern Europe.

Also present will be Jenny Romaine, who directed, choreographed and performed in The Memoirs of Glückel Hameln, a well-received musical production recently staged in New York.

A recurring theme this year will be The Lands of Poland: The Cradle of Yiddishkeit 14th to 20th Century. Michael Steinlauf, a leading authority on Polish Jewry, is one of the guest speakers.

Other session leaders include Manger Prize-winning Yiddish author Chava Rosenfarb; her daughter English professor and writer Goldie Morgenthale.

'Everything good is possible'

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

The House of Commons has a smattering of women from all parties. Their presence in the House is not new, but their motivation to engage in politics and the style they bring, in many respects, is very different.

This can be understood best by focusing on Carolyn Bennett.

First elected in 1997, Bennett, a successful physician who served as chair of the medical staff at Women's College Hospital in Toronto, is an MP for the riding of St. Paul's (Rosedale).

What brought her to Ottawa was a desire to help effect social change. She rejects the idea that only someone sitting at the cabinet table can make a difference and has proved it through her indefatigable crusades ever since she arrived in Ottawa.

To give you a sense of the scope of her activity, consider the following accomplishments over the last couple of years: She helped craft a report on natural health products that led to the establishment of a new office and screening process within Health Canada; she was a key drafter of the joint committee report on child custody and access; and she helped prepare a report on the health care, transportation and environmental challenges facing the arctic.

Bennett also championed the original tobacco bill through the House and chaired the Human Resources Development Canada (HRDC) committee reporting on persons with disabilities.

In between all of this, Bennett was elected chair of the Women's Caucus and developed a citizen engagement forum that literally set a new standard for participatory politics in the country.

Of note to the Jewish community is that she serves as the chair of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Association and has begun to develop a permanent bilateral forum for the promotion of Canada-Israel relations.

In her spare time, Bennett has written an important volume on the crises in the health care sector, aptly titled Kill or Cure?

All of this, of course, is aside from her regular duties on committees and the typical mound of constituency-based work that attaches to any MP.

Most of all, Carolyn Bennett is upbeat and refreshing. From her perspective, everything good is possible. Luckily for us, where Bennett is concerned, it's not only possible...it's probable!

Winnipeg Conservative shuls discuss merger

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two north Winnipeg Conservative synagogues are engaged in discussions aimed at merging their congregations.

The Beth Israel and Bnay Abraham synagogues have been meeting to explore the possibility of merging and representatives of the two shuls are positive about the results so far.

Positive results to date

In a special letter to congregants, Bnay Abraham president Moish Silver emphasized that the talks at this stage are just that – talks – and that no final decisions will be made without the approval of the synagogue membership. The same sentiment was expressed by Jack Litvak, who is chairing the Beth Israel's exploratory committee on the subject.

In his letter, Silver identified Bnay Abraham's aging, declining membership and financial constraints as the major reasons for merger talks.

There was also a membership survey in which 85 percent of respondents support merger discussions with another synagogue and an increase in the role of women in the service. Currently, the Bnay Abraham has mixed seating but is otherwise a traditional congregation. The Beth Israel is fully egalitarian.

"There are a number of areas where we are in agreement," says Jack Litvak, "but other areas where more negotiation is necessary. We think a good fit is possible though."

One of the issues still to be settled is where the combined congregation will be housed. Litvak comments that at the moment, neither facility is adequate.

If the congregations approve the merger, services will probably be held in the Bnay Abraham building, with an eventual relocation to an expanded Beth Israel.

The Beth Israel was planning a $2 -$3 million expansion last year, but that was based on retaining Rabbi Allan Green whose presence helped boost membership by 50 percent over the past few years. Rabbi Green is leaving the congregation at the end of August to take a position at Winnipeg's south end synagogue, Shaarey Zedek.

Litvak reports that the current aim of the negotiators is to come up with a letter of intent before Yom Tov, for the boards and membership of both congregations to consider.

Montreal school vandalized with racist graffiti

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Racist graffiti recently painted on a Laval elementary school have triggered concern that organized racists or neo-Nazis were behind them.

The graffiti, painted on the outside back wall of the Twin Oaks Elementary School in Fabreville, included not only Nazi swastikas and racist slogans such as "Kill Jews," "Heil Hitler," and "Go Home Nigger," but also a number of symbols that organized groups might use.

"We're very concerned that this was not just a random act or an isolated incident by a bunch of kids," said Robert Libman, regional executive director of B'nai Brith Canada. "Based on the level of sophistication of the signs, we don't think it was a group of people out on a one-night binge."

Libman speculated that the school may have been targeted due to its ethnically diverse student population. It was reported that there were similar incidents previously at the school.

"It's one of the most serious incidents I've seen since I've been at B'nai Brith," Libman said.

The symbols painted included the Celtic Cross, a cross inside a circle used by white supremacist groups such as Storm Front.

Another symbol was the number "88" after the word "Genocide." Each eight represents the eighth letter of the alphabet, H, signifying Heil Hitler.

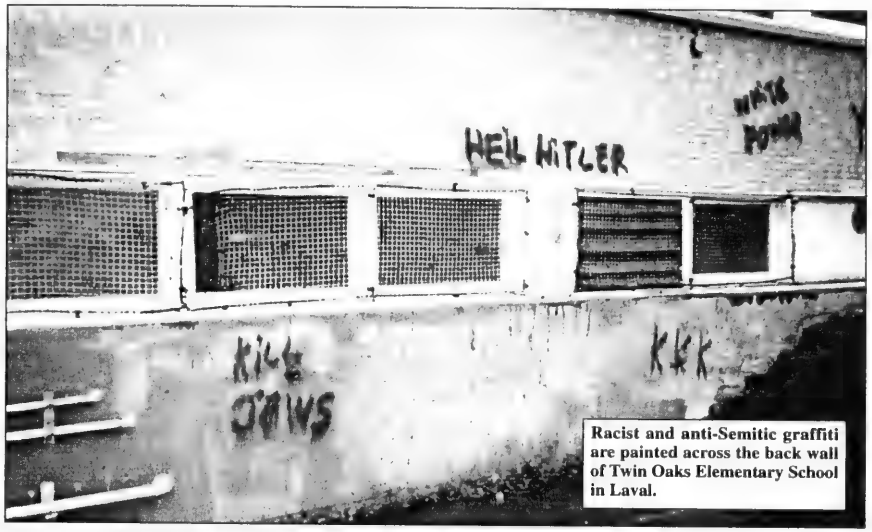
Another was "311." That number signified the 11th letter of the alphabet, K, repeated three times, as in KKK, or Ku Klux Klan.

Libman said one key in determining whether an organized group was behind the incident is if it happens again in the near future or begins to occur on a regular basis. If that is the case, he said, it could suggest a "cell" of racist activity taking root in Fabreville, an area of northern Laval just south of the Milles-îles River.

Laval police were investigating the incident, which also included a school window being broken by a rock.

Libman said the incident will be included in B'nai Brith's annual audit of anti-Semitism.

He said there were 37 incidents reported in Quebec last year, but only "a handful" consisted of daubings.



Racist and anti-Semitic graffiti are painted across the back wall of Twin Oaks Elementary School in Laval.

Board of Winnipeg Vaad Ha'ir approves major changes

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The board of Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir overwhelmingly approved major changes to the organization.

Among the motions passed on Thursday, Aug. 3, were the creation of a new designation for its licensees – the new MBK designation is to be phased in over the next year as WK licensees come up for renewal – and the appointment of Orthodox rabbis Avraham Altein, Yaacov Benamou and Moshe Stern to oversee kashrut in Winnipeg.

In introducing the far-reaching changes, Vaad President Don Aronovich reviewed the process that has led to the changes. He recalled that as president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council four years ago, he had struck a committee charged with reviewing the state of kashrut in Winnipeg.

"The committee's report made it clear that the status quo was not good enough," he said. "The WK symbol is not widely recognized. We felt that we had to deal with the WK hechsher."

For the past few years, Rabbi Peretz Weizman has served as the Rav Hamachshir of the Vaad. For the past year, however, Winnipeg's senior rabbi, retired from the Bnay Abraham Synagogue, has been spending much of his time serving as the rabbi of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

"After five decades of dedicated service, Rabbi Weizman has decided to retire," Aronovich said.

The president reported that he and his executive approached Rabbi Benamou, spiritual leader of the Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue for input. They have also been looking beyond Winnipeg for advice.

"We have had numerous discussions with Rabbi Reuben Bulka of Ottawa ... as well as COR rabbis ... in Toronto. They insisted that we had to involve as many our community's orthodox rabbis as possible. Rabbis Altein (the Lubavitch rabbi here), Benamou and Stern have agreed to work together for the good of the community. We want to create a high standard of kashrut which will be acceptable to all denominations."

AIDS specialist named research director at JGH

MONTREAL — A renowned AIDS researcher has been appointed director of research at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH).

Mark Wainberg, 55, who has just completed a two-year term as president of the International AIDS Society, succeeds immunologist Dr. Samuel O. Freedman, 72, who has retired after nine years.

"I would like the general Quebec community to recognize and appreciate that the JGH is an integral part of research at McGill University," Wainberg stated.

He added that he is "counting on the hospital board and administration to remain steadfast in their support of JGH academic activities."

Recruiting "best and brightest" clinician-scientists to the JGH's Lady Davis Institute for Medical Research is one of Wainberg's top priorities, and he is committed to enhancing the interaction between clinicians and scientists within the hospital.

Wainberg was most recently scientific director at the JGH. He continues as director of the McGill AIDS Centre, which is based at the JGH.

Wainberg was the first scientist in Canada to work directly on HIV.

He was among the first scientists in the world to identify the problem of HIV drug resistance and played a key role in the discovery of 3TC, a treatment for AIDS.

In July, he was chief organizer of the 13th International AIDS Conference held in South Africa, and will chair the 15th conference in Toronto in 2004.

A professor in the departments of microbiology and immunology, pediatrics and medicine at McGill, Wainberg has authored and co-authored over 300 publications in medical journals.

Freedman, who is credited with developing the Lady Davis into one of the best research institutes in Canada, will remain at the JGH as a senior adviser for academic affairs.

Sunnybrook Hospital Memorial honours RCAF officer

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — I never met Sammy Kwinter, yet I would know him instantly if he were to walk down the street – fair haired, handsome, with a jaunty step, an eye for the girls and the girls eyeing him.

But I will never see him, because he was killed in World War II, and I did not meet his friend Joe – who would become my husband – until after the war.

RCAF Flying Officer Samuel Noah (Zalman) Kwinter was 24 when his plane was shot down over Hungary in 1944 and he was reported missing in action. Six weeks later it was confirmed that five of the eight-man crew including Sammy, had died in the crash. Three bailed out and were taken prisoner.

Sammy lies in the British Commonwealth Cemetery on the outskirts of Buda in Budapest.

Now in the year 2000, his family has presented a particularly meaningful memorial in his name, a heritage showcase for Judaic artifacts, which graces the synagogue at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre. There is a war veterans' wing on the hospital grounds.

Sammy's brother, Moe, and sisters, Frances Grossman and the late Lily Nyman, supported the synagogue previously and this gift is a reflection of their ongoing commitment.

At the dedication, attended by friends and relatives, Rabbi Peretz Weizman affirmed, "In reality, we don't lose people we love. They continue to live in our minds and in our hearts."

He said Sammy's memory and life are ingathered with his people's traditions and principles. "As Jewish life is eternal, so will be his blessed memory."

During a dinner following the dedication, Moe's son, Sandford Noah (Zalman) Kwinter, who is Sammy's namesake, noted that his uncle's crew was given the notoriously hazardous Pathfinder Squad assignment.

"Their task was to fly in ahead of the bombers, light up the target and draw fire," he explained.

Pathfinder pilots had the highest fatality rate in the war.

Sammy's first attachment was to the Royal Air Force and while in London he was "adopted" by Faye and David Cowan who welcomed a number of overseas servicemen at their home in Hendon. Here they could relax on leave and sit down to Friday night dinners. Sammy listed Mrs. Cowan as his next of kin in England.

Much of Sammy's duty involved bombing runs on Romanian oil fields from a base in Sicily. Completing his full tour of duty, on re-enlistment he was offered a less dangerous assignment but declined, determined "to fight and risk all in actively resisting Nazism," maintains his nephew. It was on a return flight from Romania that his plane was shot down over Hungary.

Sammy Kwinter grew up in an apartment over his parents' butcher shop, Naftuly's, at the corner of Spadina and Baldwin. He was a pupil at Orde St. Public School and graduated from Harbord Collegiate.

He delivered kosher meat all over the city from Cabbagetown to North Toronto.

On Sundays, when he had completed the last delivery, he picked up "the boys," his friends from Club Savoy and drove them in his father's big Dodge to Sunnyside Beach, recalls Murray Shapiro.

RCAF Flying Officer Samuel Noah (Zalman) Kwinter

At night they invited themselves to weddings or bar mitzvahs at the Belvin on College Street or one of the numerous shuls in the district.

At weddings, before dancing with any unattached girls they would quickly inquire, "Are you on the bride's or groom's side?" They would then immediately claim the alternate relationship.

On other occasions, they would be invited to girls' homes where they danced to popular records, snuggled a bit if the in-house parents weren't too watchful, filled up on cake and pop and then escorted the girls home.

Sammy played basketball at 44 St. George St., which became a Jewish servicemen's canteen during the war and he also played hockey at Christie Pits.

He loved to dance, and Saul Cantor remembers him at the Seabreeze, Palace Pier, Top Hat, Silver Slipper, just a few of the places where he was well known.

"He was the centre of everything that was going on," Cantor says.

Somehow, through all these years, Sammy has always surfaced in his friends' conversations. Although "the boys" are in their late 70s and early 80s, Sammy is still with them.

Barak shuffles the deck just to stay in the game

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

No longer having a majority in the Knesset, Prime Minister Ehud Barak has moved rapidly to shift public attention away from his political weakness to his gritty determination to stay in power.

Barak filled four cabinet positions that had been held by parties that left his coalition, with members of his One Israel Party, and they set about purging officials put in place by the previous ministers.

Analysis

At the same time, government sources intimated that informal talks with the Palestinians are continuing with the intent of resuming the peace negotiations broken off at Camp David last month.

And, in a third step designed to shore up his power — or at least the perception of his power — Barak launched into high-profile discussions with possible new coalition allies.

The purge at the ministries included the peremptory dismissal — it was billed a "resignation" — of the director general of the foreign ministry, Eitan Ben-Tsur, and the recall of Likud-appointed envoys abroad, among them the ambassador to France, former Likud legislator Eliahu Ben-Elissar.

Barak, who took over the Foreign Ministry himself after the resignation last week of David Levy, plans to appoint a professional diplomat and close political confidant, Alon Liel, as director general. Liel served as Israeli ambassador to South Africa during the 1990s.

Levy reacted by claiming that Barak had "lost his senses" and was trying to ram through appointments while he still has power.

But Barak denied that he was "settling the score" with Levy, who resigned amid charges that Barak had conceded too much to the Palestinians at Camp David.

"It is natural for the director general to change when a new minister comes in," Barak said at a briefing. "As for the ambassadors, their contracts were up, and they had known this for a long time."

In the reshuffling of other cabinet assignments, Communications Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer took over the housing portfolio; Finance Minister Avraham Shochat assumed control of the Infrastructure Ministry; Haim Ramon took over the Interior Ministry; and Justice Minister Yossi Beilin assumed the religious affairs portfolio.

These ministries had been held by the three parties — Shas, Yisrael Ba'Aliyah and the National Religious Party — that bolted the governing coalition on the eve of the Camp David summit.

Less money for West Bank settlements

Barak and his team of ministers soon made it clear that there would be a price to be paid for these defections.

After taking over the Housing Ministry, which had been held by Yitzhak Levy of the NRP, Ben-Eliezer vowed there would be far less money for Jewish settlements in the West Bank and much more for Negev development towns.

Beilin ordered the transfer of a key rabbinical department to the Chief Rabbinate. This department, which is responsible for the appointment of hundreds of rabbis around the country, has traditionally been a fertile source of patronage for the political parties that have run the Religious Affairs Ministry — most recently Shas.

Beilin said he would like to dismantle the ministry entirely, subsuming its functions into the Interior Ministry and the local authorities.

For his part, Ramon, stepping into the Interior Ministry, formerly a Yisrael Ba'Aliyah fiefdom, deliberately nurtured expectations that heads would roll.

Barak and his party are determined to create an image of business as usual, despite the premier's perilous condition in the Knesset, where the coalition controls only 42 of the Parliament's 120 seats.

They believe that during the current three-month Knesset recess the premier cannot constitutionally be voted out of office by a no-confidence motion.

They therefore feel that they have a breathing space in which to reassert their control over the country and perhaps rebuild their coalition.

With this in mind, Barak met with Knesset member Roman Bronfman, who last year broke away along with one colleague from Natan Sharansky's Yisrael Ba'Aliyah Party to form his own party, Democratic Choice.

The premier also met with Haim Katz, a legislator from the One Nation Party, which also holds two Knesset seats and is also a possible coalition partner.

While the arithmetic still does not add up to a stable legislative majority – unless Shas, with its 17 Knesset seats, returns to the fold – Barak seems anxious to project confidence that he can keep the ship-of-state in motion while diplomatic efforts continue.

This effort to resuscitate the peace process received a boost from Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Touring the Arab world in an effort to garner support following the failed Camp David summit, Arafat said there might be another summit after the Democratic Party convention is held in Los Angeles.

Barak said that it is still too soon to talk about a new summit.

"I have not heard about the convening of a summit, and I doubt that conditions are right for such a summit," Barak said.

Barak described Peres' talks as "informal but important."

For his part, Arafat has ample motivation to move forward with the peace process before the end of the Knesset recess. If Barak fails to shore up his coalition by then, and the opposition manages to get through a no-confidence motion, Arafat may find himself without a peace partner.

Europe cool to PA unilateral declaration

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — European leaders have indicated opposition to a unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood after meeting separately with acting Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Israeli officials believe that the lack of European enthusiasm for such a declaration has compelled Arafat to abandon plans to declare a Palestinian state on Sept. 13.

In response to these developments, Prime Minister Barak has revised his peace process timetable, targeting the end of September as the deadline for completing talks with the Palestinians.

German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer voiced opposition to a move to unilateral Palestinian statehood in a phone conversation with Ben-Ami. Fischer said that in light of the progress he believes was made at Camp David, such a PA declaration would not be warranted.

In Russia, President Vladimir Putin told Arafat he should not issue a unilateral declaration.

In a discussion with Spanish Foreign Minister Josep Pique, Ben-Ami asked Spain to pressure other members of the European Union to avoid expressing support for unilateral Palestinian action. Spain should tell EU members, Ben-Ami said, that such a move would cause irreversible harm to the peace process.

Pique promised Ben-Ami that Spain would work to ensure that the EU coordinates its moves on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process with the United States.

Diplomatic sources said that two conclusions can be drawn from Ben-Ami's talks with European leaders. First, the Europeans are favourably disposed to positions espoused by Barak at Camp David, and admire the prime minister's courage.

Second, in some European countries, leaders are uneasy with Arafat's demand that the Palestinians be given control of Christian holy places in Jerusalem.

Arafat's demand that the international community back the positions taken by the PA at Camp David has stirred little response.

Joe Lieberman 'grew up' in Stamford synagogue

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Network TV trucks have been driving by the Agudath Sholom Synagogue in a virtual convoy and the phone hasn't stopped ringing, but the congregation in the Stamford, Conn., shul doesn't seem to mind.

They're abuzz at all the attention. One of their members, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, has made history as the first Jew to be nominated as a candidate for the vice-presidency of the United States.

In the wake of Al Gore's selection of Lieberman, an observant Jew, as his running mate, the media have been streaming to the shul to see first hand where the vice-presidential candidate grew up.

Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of Agudath Sholom for the past three years, has fielded plenty of phone calls from reporters curious about Lieberman's past. He can only tell them what they have already heard from political friends and foes alike – the candidate is "honest, straightforward… he's responsible."

Rabbi Dratch, who served at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim synagogue for five years prior to moving to Connecticut, described Lieberman as a man of integrity and courage – someone who was willing to criticize his good friend, Bill Clinton, over the Monica Lewinsky affair and who sent a videotaped acceptance speech to the Democratic convention when nominated as U.S. senator, rather than appear in person and violate the Sabbath.

"That takes a lot of guts," he said.

Lieberman's ties to the synagogue go back three generations. His grandparents were members and so were his parents.

Lieberman's late father owned a liquor store and was involved in the real estate business while his mother Marcia, who is shomer Shabbat, is heavily involved in charitable work.

She still lives near the shul and is "a champion for the cause of senior citizens," Rabbi Dratch said.

"She tells wonderful stories about growing up. Her parents' home was open to strangers passing through town," and she sometimes had to give up her room to make space for visitors. Community service was part of the family ethos, Rabbi Dratch said.

Lieberman attended Jewish afternoon school at the synagogue and remains a member, occasionally attending services on Shabbat and holidays, the rabbi added.

Although Lieberman "was born in this synagogue," the candidate does not spend as much time there as he used to, Rabbi Dratch said.

Most of the time, Lieberman resides in New Haven, Conn., and Washington, D.C.

Over the course of his tenure in Stamford, Rabbi Dratch has discussed various issues with Lieberman and he finds the senator "cerebral and bright."

Lieberman's world view is influenced by his Judaism. "Through learning and consultation, he knows what to do. But he doesn't have a rabbi sitting in the corner, telling him what to do," Rabbi Dratch said.

"In terms of the his stand on issues, there are many different influences, but certainly his Jewishness plays a role. I don't see that he's going to vote due to Jewish criteria."

Rabbi Dratch pointed to several issues where Lieberman diverged from what might have been expected of someone toeing a Jewish line.

"He's against clemency for [convicted spy] Jonathan Pollard, even though that's not popular among many Jews," Rabbi Dratch said.

Lieberman is pro-choice and he's in favour of gay rights, even though the Bible condemns homosexuality.

"The Torah prohibits homosexual behaviour but it doesn't speak to the element of discrimination. That's a political question, not a religious question," Rabbi Dratch said. "Lieberman is not there to legislate Halachah (traditional Jewish law). He's there as an American."

Rabbi Dratch suggested the nomination of Lieberman "speaks of a coming of age in America, of a maturity. But one day it may just be an interesting footnote in his campaign."

The following are statements made by Democratic vice-presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman.

On Israel:

"American policy and Israeli policy has been in the same direction."

"I have got a lot of friends in the Arab-American community."

"I'm a believer in the peace process."

On moving the Israeli Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem:

"I have been a supporter of moving our embassy to Jerusalem. It just seems to me that in every other country in the world, we put our embassy in the city that the country says is its capital.

"The piece of land where – which we already have designated for an American embassy in Jerusalem – it is in a part of Jerusalem that was Israeli back to 1948. So under no settlement would that change."

"Let's wait until the end of year, see where we are, and then, before [President Clinton] leaves office, he will make a decision about moving that embassy."

On his faith and practice:

"I'm not surprised that there's been a lot of focus on my religion now, because we've broken a barrier."

"I believe that my faith is going to strengthen my ability in this next opportunity that I've been fortunate enough to be given – just as it has throughout my life."

"They're going to ask me some very fair questions. You know, 'Will you do your government work on your Sabbath?' Well, of course I will. That's what I've always done. That's my responsibility. That's a value that, in my understanding of my religion, takes precedence over the normal way I observe the Sabbath, as important as my religion is."

"I like to think of myself, as an observant Jew, because it is broader and it's inclusive."

"When it comes to governmental responsibility, I have always felt – and the rabbis have encouraged me in this – and Jewish tradition does – that when you have a responsibility to people that can protect or advance their well-being, or their lives, then you have got to do it. If the Sabbath is about respecting creation and honouring and protecting human life, then how could you let the specific prohibitions of the Sabbath stop you from doing that? So I voted on the Sabbath."

On the role of religion in the campaign:

"I think religion, not through the state but in our country, has always been a great asset."

"I think it [religion] informs and makes us a better country."

On being chosen as a candidate:

"I cannot express with words the gratitude that I feel in my heart today as the first Jewish American to be honoured to be a major party candidate for the vice-presidency of this blessed United States of America of ours!"

"There are some people who might actually call Al's selection of me an act of chutzpah."

"I am so grateful, and it redeems the faith that my parents gave me when they brought me up, which is that you know you don't have to be like everybody else to make it in America. America gains its strength from its diversity, and the American people are fair, and they are tolerant and they will judge you based on who you are and what your qualities are."

On anti-Semitism:

"I'm sure there are some anti-Semites out there. But you know, this people, the American people, are so tolerant, they're so open, I'm just convinced that they're going to vote for me or against me not based on my religion, but based on how they judge me as a person and whether they think I can do this job, and I can't ask any more than that."

A Jewish vice-president?

Questions were raised about the Massachusetts senator's "dual loyalty" – that as a Catholic, he owed more allegiance to the Vatican than to the United States. Even some liberal Protestant theologians voiced concerns about the lack of independence within the Roman Catholic Church.

In a speech at a Houston hotel in September, Kennedy decided to tackle the issue head-on.

"I believe in a president whose views on religion are his own private affair, neither imposed on him by the nation nor imposed by the nation upon him as a condition to holding that office," Kennedy said.

"I believe in an America where the separation of church and state is absolute," Kennedy said, adding that he opposed public funds for any church or church school.

That speech is credited with having put the issue to rest in the election – although while Kennedy earned 80 percent of the Catholic vote, he received less than one-third of the Protestant vote.

Observers say attitudes have changed in the United States in the past 40 years. Lieberman himself supports school voucher plans that provide government funds to help needy students attend parochial or private schools.

Districts with minuscule Jewish populations have Jewish representatives in Congress.

"There will still be a whispering campaign against Joe Lieberman, and there will still be an anti-Semitic vote," said Allan Lichtman, the chair of the department of history at American University.

But, he added, "those who would not be likely to vote for Joe Lieberman on religious grounds would not be likely to vote for Al Gore anyway."

Gore doesn't need any help with the Jewish vote. Jews overwhelmingly vote Democrat, and the Clinton-Gore administration has been popular with most Jewish voters.

Of course, Gore's selection of an observant Jew could help him among Orthodox Jewish voters, whose views are closer to Republican positions on issues like vouchers and school prayer.

But if it's not clear if Lieberman will help the vice president among Southern conservatives, who are widely considered to be solidly in Bush's camp.

Even among voters unlikely to support the Gore-Lieberman ticket, the moderate Connecticut senator could challenge a lot of pre-existing views about Jews in general – and Orthodox Jews in particular. He's fair-skinned, quiet, not wealthy – and doesn't wear a yarmulke.

"He's going to break a lot of stereotypes," said Rabbi Kurt Stone, whose book about Jewish politicians, The Congressional Minyan: The Jews of Capitol Hill, will soon be released.

But whether the stereotypes have broken in enough minds for religion not to come into play in the voting booth remains to be seen.

As Democratic pollster Mark Mellman put it, "We had a test 40 years ago with John F. Kennedy, and we passed. We have a test with Joe Lieberman, and I think the country is going to pass."

President of Maccabi World Union resigns

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Maccabi World Union (MWU) President Ronald Bakalarz has resigned – three years after a bridge disaster at the 1997 Maccabiah Games claimed the lives of four Australian athletes and injured dozens of others.

Bakalarz's resignation followed a series of events that put increasing pressure on the beleaguered international Maccabi movement. In July, a Knesset committee released a report that concluded Bakalarz should step down. Earlier, MWU chair Uzi Netanel resigned his post shortly after an Israeli court found Yoram Eyal guilty of criminal negligence causing death. Eyal was the MWU official who organized the Games' opening ceremonies. Four others – the builders and engineers – were also found guilty of negligence.

Despite his resignation, Bakalarz was defiant, claiming the Knesset report was unfair and that he was being forced to relinquish his post without full justification.

"I have always said that if the time comes that my presidency might negatively impact in any way on our youngsters, I would resign from my office," Bakalarz wrote in his letter of resignation to the members of the MWU executive meeting in New York. Bakalarz had served six years as president.

Bakalarz termed the Knesset report "totally biased and inaccurate." He said he read the report with "great sadness, distress and frustration."

Leaves post three years after '97 bridge disaster

Nevertheless, Bakalarz wrote that he decided to resign "to insure the continuity and success of the 16th Maccabiah Games, as well as participation of Jewish athletes from all over the world."

Maccabi Canada President Roy Salomon, who attended the MWU meeting, called Bakalarz "one of the finest presidents in our history. I believe an injustice has been done."

Salomon, who also serves as co-chair of the North American Confederation of MWU, said Bakalarz's resignation was a selfless act that was done with the best interests of the Maccabi movement in mind. Had he not resigned, there was "the danger that Israel would not participate [in the competitions] and we would not have the backing of the government. That is a serious situation relative to the Games."

The Knesset committee had recommended that if Bakalarz did not resign to demonstrate accountability for the disaster, then Israel should not finance the 2001 Games or take part in any of its public events.

In addition, there was a good chance Maccabi Australia would not send a team to the Games unless he resigned, Salomon added.

Salomon said Maccabi Canada has consistently supported Bakalarz and that many of the public comments about him and the Maccabi movement have been inaccurate.

Referring to the events that followed the bridge collapse, Salomon said both Bakalarz and Netanel visited victims in the hospital and Maccabi officials grieved with those who lost loved ones.

Except for the 1997 disaster, the MWU had "run 14 Maccabiahs without incidence of drugs, with professionalism, without major injuries and without major incidents," Salomon said.

In Israel, meanwhile, MWU chair Oudi Recanati accepted "with sadness and pain my friend Ronald Bakalarz's courageous decision to resign... This is an act of leadership that proves true sacrifice for unity [and] hope for the future."

In Australia however, Colin Elterman, welcomed Bakalarz's resignation. Elterman, whose daughter Sasha was infected with a brain fungus as a result of her plunge into the polluted Yarkon River, said "he resigns ungraciously without making any concessions that his past actions may have been flawed."

Several outstanding issues still needed to be addressed, including assurance that next summer's games will be safe and insurance payments will be made to the victims' families, he added.

Rabbi's remarks based on kabbalist theology

His comments immediately drew a barrage of condemnation from a variety of quarters in Israel and the Diaspora. But in Toronto, reaction from some quarters was less critical.

Rabbi David Schochet of the Lubavitch movement said "people apparently didn't understand what he said. Perhaps he shouldn't have spoken above their heads."

Rabbi Schochet, who serves as head of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim, the council of Orthodox rabbis, said the theology behind Rabbi Yosef's remarks was sensitive and complex.

"Essentially, those who died in the Holocaust were pure people, holy people, without sin." But, he continued, "they must have been a reincarnation of people who had sinned at some time.

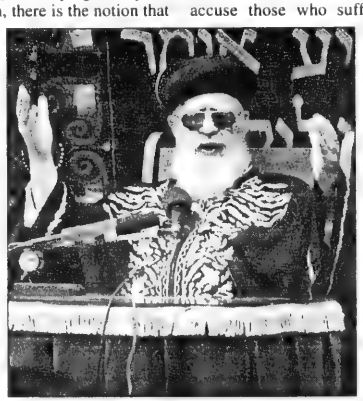
"That doesn't mean it's any excuse for the Nazis, in the same way it wasn't an excuse for Pharaoh for enslaving the Jews."

He said that "if you look at history in general, you see wherever there is assimilation, a calamity happens." Rabbi Schochet pointed to the Jewish experience in medieval Spain and in modern Germany, where assimilation was followed by the murder and expulsion of Jews."It is a pattern in history," he said.

Rabbi Schochet said the Kabbalah – the theology of Jewish mysticism – is too complicated to be discussed in radio broadcasts. Kabbalists believe the souls of people who have died without atoning for their sins return in another life to atone.

A similar reading of Rabbi Yosef's remarks was advanced by the U.S.-based Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ). In a release, Rabbi Ronald Price, executive vice-president of UTJ and dean of its rabbinical school, said Rabbi Yosef's remarks had been misinterpreted. "His words are based on a sophisticated kabbalistic notion of why suffering comes to good people," he said.

Rabbi Martin Berman of Shaar Shalom Synagogue, a Conservative congregation in Thornhill, said "people have misunderstood what [Rabbi Yosef] was trying to say. In kabbalistic tradition, there is the notion that people may have sinned and not gained full atonement, so to get divine mercy, they suffer punishment to enter the world to come, having atoned for their sins."



Rabbi Ovadia Yosef gives a lecture to supporters at a Jerusalem synagogue. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Rabbi Berman, who said he did not agree with that theological interpretation of the Holocaust, suggested "what Rabbi Yosef said was this is God's mercy. Otherwise, there'd be no atonement and no entry into olam habah [the world to come]."

Rabbi Peretz Weizman of Winnipeg's B'nay Abraham Congregation, was scathing in his condemnation of Rabbi Yosef.

"I see this as a distorted theology," Rabbi Weizman said. "They [Rabbi Yosef and those who agree with his kabbalistic interpretation] are sacrificing six million Jews to justify their distorted, corrupted, unfounded theology about hashgachat prateet [Divine providence for the individual]," said Rabbi Weizman, a survivor of the Lodz ghetto and the Czestochowa concentration camp.

"Since the Holocaust is a denial of their theology, they are sacrificing six million to fit into their theology," he said.

His voice rising in anger, Rabbi Weizman asked of Rabbi Yosef: "Who are you to accuse those who suffered?... Here are people [Holocaust victims] who are called kedoshim [holy] and he [Rabbi Yosef] is making them the worst people possible...What can be a greater chilul, a greater desecration?"

Rabbi Weizman, who lost 80 relatives in the Holocaust, including six brothers and sisters, said Rabbi Yosef's statement would provide "fuel to the anti-Semites... It means Hitler made a mitzvah. [Rabbi Yosef] should ask for forgiveness from the six million martyrs who gave their lives for kiddush HaShem [sanctifying the name of God]," he said.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader at the Conservative Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogue in Toronto, said his initial reaction on hearing Rabbi Yosef's comments were, "he should consider retirement."

Calling Rabbi Yosef's statement a "goof" and "a blunder," Rabbi Scheim said, "Even if that is what he believes, it wasn't necessary for him to make that speech.

"It's very dangerous to try to interpret the Holocaust in terms of biblical theology or medieval theology," he said. He added that this exacerbated tension between Sephardim (Shas is a largely Sephardi movement) and Ashkenazim.

In Montreal, the Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ) dissociated itself from Rabbi Yosef's comments. In a statement, the CSQ said it agreed with Ehud Barak's response to Rabbi Yosef's remarks, saying "they strike a blow at the memory of the victims of the Shoah and the sensibility of their families and of the entire people."

In Israel, Barak said Rabbi Yosef's remarks were not fitting for a rabbi of his standing, while Palestinian spokespersons condemned his remarks as racist.

In a statement, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations said, "Rabbi Yosef's comments on the Holocaust and his suggestion that the victims of the Nazis were the reincarnated souls of Jewish sinners, are nothing less than an unforgivably arrogant blasphemy."

The UAHC, a Reform organization, also called Rabbi Yosef's remarks about Palestinians "outrageous" "abhorrent" and "dangerous."

Ha'aretz reported that Shas spokesman Itzik Sudri said Rabbi Yosef's recent comment on Arabs were taken out of context.

"Snakes are a metaphor," Studri said. "By the same token, the rabbi could have used some other animal, cats or dogs. He wanted to indicate [Arab] slyness and guile."

Fishin' expedition features enormous feast on shore

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

POINTE DU BOIS, Man. — For the past week or so, everything to me has smelled like minnows.

My pants smell like minnows, my car smells like minnows, restaurants smell like minnows, even corporate boardrooms have the unmistakable, though muted, whiff of fish. Those salty, silvery, previously frozen fishes that come in margarine containers and whose primary purpose in life is to serve as food for bigger fishes, seem to be everywhere.

Along with suntan lotion and barbecue smoke, minnows to me represent the smell of summer – an olfactory sensation that quickly links we city types to the great outdoors.

Recently, four friends and I got to spend two full days sharing a couple of boats with a dozen containers of minnows, on what has turned into a summertime tradition – a fishin' expedition in the wilds of my home province, Manitoba.

Up the Winnipeg River, about a 90 minute drive northeast of the Manitoba capital, behind the hydro-electric dam at Pointe du Bois, another 45 minutes up river by boat, you'll find a scenic and tranquil spot where cell phones don't reach. There, in a bend in the river, sits Pine Island Lodge.

A self-contained assortment of cabins that relies on local generators, the lodge offers a rustic and bare accommodation for dedicated fishermen. Women are scarce at the lodge, though prior to embarking on our trip we contemplated inviting wives along – for about a millisecond. This was to be a time for boys' bonding.

Rooms at the lodge are spare but the kitchen is large, with two fridge/freezer units available to store the daily catch as well as the numerous containers of minnows and worms that will serve as yummy enticements for slow-thinking walleye. Rumour has it that the fish you can't eat for shore lunch end up in the fridge/freezer to be taken home, but that's something I can't speak about from personal experience.

Shore lunch is one of fishing's great traditions, the gauge by which you judge the success of your trip. There's not much that can beat the fun and satisfaction of choosing the right spot to land your boats, to starting a wood fire, to frying up the morning catch, to preparing the fried potatoes and onions that accompany the fish dish, to downing the vodkas and brewskies that helped wash it all down.

For this tender-footed fisherman, shore lunches make or break a fishing trip. A pan full of frying pickerel marks success; a second course of smokies cooking on a grill over the wood fire is not a bad consolation prize.

A rainstorm is the only thing that could dampen the joy of the event, but we enjoyed two days of brilliant sunshine and cobalt-blue skies. Although the morning temperature on day two plummeted to a bone-chilling plus three, the skies held out the promise of a nice day ahead.

At 6 a.m., the two most dedicated fishermen among us motored onto the water for an early morning confrontation with some particularly crafty walleye, while three of us availed ourselves of more sleep followed by a pot of hot coffee and some bagels.

For their trouble, our fishing fanatics managed to bag one particularly unlucky fish, giving us a good head start en route to shore lunch.

As the morning progressed and the temperature rose, we loaded our three-seater boats (powered by 15-horsepower Mercs) with all the necessary equipment – vodka, beer, tonic water, sunflower seeds, smokies, potatoes, chips and, oh yes, rods and reels.

Fisherman extraordinaire Mark Newman shows off a walleye, a good eatin' fish that makes for a lip-smacking shore lunch. [Paul Lungen photos]

Once out on the water, the minnows were put to good use. Walleye, a.k.a. pickerel, like to feed near the bottom and so to get them, you generally must use a jig. A jig is a round metal ball with a hook at one end (that's where the minnows come in) that drops to the bottom and offers the walleye what appears to be a free lunch. But as we know in life, there is no free lunch, unless you're fishing with us city boys.

Many was the time that some smart-alecky walleye or pike or sauger or bass, nibbled bait off the line, or grabbed it and gave us a good tussle, only to escape at the last minute. But those fish were a good 5 lbs. if not more, so it's no surprise they got away. That's our story and we're sticking to it.

In the end, we managed to catch enough good eatin' fish to enjoy a fine shore lunch. But as one wag calculated, if you compare the price of the trip to the number of fish we caught, those pickerel ran us about $200 a pound. And that's not including minnows.

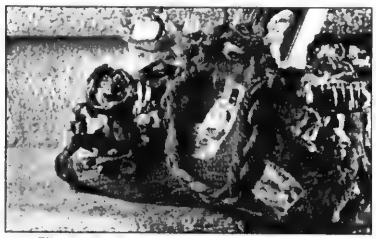
Artist's infuses work with her soul

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Moroccan-born sculptor/painter Lynda Herskovits draws on a powerful spiritual core as she infuses her work with her Jewish heart and soul.In her home, paintings and sculptures in clay and wood, overflow from room to room.

The Wandering Jew is a poignant piece. A battered suitcase covered with stamps from many countries captures the plight of the Jew in exile, "always ready to go." A fiddler perches with his instrument and a man carries the five scrolls of the Torah. An old woman leaning against the suitcase holds two lit candles. Everything is portable.



The Wandering Jew is a poignant piece.

The style is basically primitive, yet there is detail and perception.

Art was not always central in Herskovits' life. After earning a BA in French and Spanish at York University, she travelled the world both independently and as a representative for Seiko watches, but she was always searching for something more meaningful.

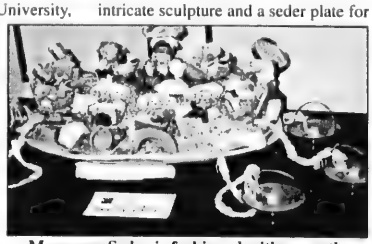
Some years ago, Herskovits' brother, Aaron, a chassidic rabbi who teaches at Montreal's Hebrew Academy, took her to visit a chassidic community outside Outremont, presided over by the revered Rabbi Loewe. Facing the rabbi's piercing eyes, she was transfixed, feeling that in some mysterious way, she had been blessed.

But it wasn't until years later when she was pregnant with her second child, that the obsession with art erupted.

"Suddenly, without any training, with no experience, I knew that I could sculpt," she says. "It was just there!"

Energetic and prolific, she is constantly exploring new thought and technique.

Reflective of Herskovits' birthplace is Moroccan Seder. Fashioned with warmth and affection. it is both an intricate sculpture and a seder plate for actual use, commemorating local Pesach customs. According to tradition, the oldest man or woman present is given the honour of starting the seder with a prayer for freedom



Moroccan Seder is fashioned with warmth.

A deepening affinity for religion has prompted her to tell her brother, "What you do in your way, I do in mine, through my art. This is my prayer."

In preparation for her older son's forthcoming bar mitzvah, Herskovits has hand sculpted 22 bar mitzvah youths as table centrepieces. Each wears a kippah and holds a dove for peace and a Torah. She has also designed the invitations.

Actress meets her idols during TV shoot

By FRANCES KRAFT

TORONTO — Some of Tali Lewin's friends were even more excited than she was over her latest acting job. The 12-year-old will soon be seen across Canada and the United States in a Burger King commercial with the Backstreet Boys.

Tali Lewin

"It was pretty exciting and amazing. Basically, it was just really fun," Lewin said in an interview at the office of her agent, Shari Quallenberg, of Talent Vision.

The commercial, shot at a Toronto Burger King, features four youngsters, two boys and two girls. There will be four 30-second spots, and two scenes were shot with Lewin.

Lewin is the girl who exclaims, "There they are!" when the five heartthrobs enter the fast food restaurant.

"I'd never seen them perform, so this was really exciting," said Lewin.

But while other young fans were swarming the set – hoping for at least a glimpse of A.J. McLean, Brian Littrell, Howie Dorough, Kevin Richardson and Nick Carter – Lewin and the other three young actors were ensconced in their own trailer, near the five trailers that each housed a Backstreet Boy. Entry to the area was restricted, Lewin recalled.

The young actors met Richardson and McLean, Lewin's new favourite. "We said we're going to be in the commercial, and A.J. said, 'Cool.' He was really nice to us."

A big smile lit up Lewin's face as she recalled her reaction when it was confirmed she'd actually be working with the Backstreet Boys. "I was like, 'Oh my God!' I was so excited."

Over the past few years, Lewin has appeared in almost a dozen commercials. A member of the children's theatre troupe CharActors, where she appeared as Adelaide in Guys & Dolls at the Yorkwoods theatre, Lewin got her showbiz start at age nine in the cast and chorus of Show Boat, at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts (now Toronto Centre for the Arts).

Prior to that, she had studied dance for five years. She still takes tap, jazz, ballet and acro.

Her musical ability likely comes from her father Mickey, a singer and bandleader.

A student at a local arts school, she is also taking part in a musical theatre program at day camp this summer.

Eventually, she'd like to have a performing career as an adult. "I really like to sing and dance and perform."

SHOLEM ASCH RECONSIDERED

Peter and Sylvia Lustgarten, and Ben and Anne Marmur, all of Toronto, were among a handful of Canadian participants at a scholarly conference on the influential Yiddish author Sholem Asch, which took place several months ago at Yale University in New Haven, Conn.

Asch was born in Kutno, Poland, in 1880 and died in London, England in 1957. Beginning in 1904, he published many novels dealing with Jewish life from the then contemporary shtetl to historic epochs such as the time of the Chm'nielsky massacres. He wrote mostly in Yiddish, but nearly all of his works have been translated into English.

His novels appeared in regular instalments in the Yiddish-language Forward until he presented that important New York daily with the first of three books about the founders of Christianity. Though the trilogy was well-received by the wider literary community, most Jewish critics took the Forward's lead and attacked Asch as a heretic.

"In my opinion, he was a flawed genius," says Sylvia Lustgarten, former director of the UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish. "When you read Sholem Aleichem, every sentence is brilliant. But Sholem Asch, although he was a fabulous writer with great imagination, was given to excess.

"The conference was an attempt to reconsider Asch's literary reputation. Somehow, he has fallen in people's esteem. The Jewish community couldn't understand why he was writing about Christianity."

Lustgarten is an enthusiastic member of several local Yiddish reading groups, including one that she founded in the Eglinton-Bathurst area. For details, call 416-787-6548.

Awards for NFB: Village of Idiots, a short film based on a Jewish folk tale, is one of two animated shorts produced by the National Film Board of Canada that were honoured recently at the International Animated Film Festival in Annecy, France.

Directed by Oscar-winner Eugene Fedorenko and Rose Newlove, Village of Idiots "offers a very funny take at the human tendency to romanticize what we don't have." The Toronto Jewish Film Fest screened the film last May.

The NFB's other award-winner is The Hat/Le Chapeau, directed by Michele Cournoyer. Eye on Arts is glad to see that this historic Canadian institution is upholding its longstanding reputation for excellence.

Posthumous Collection: Matt Cohen's last novel, Elizabeth and After, won a Governor General's award in late 1999, which the author accepted in Ottawa. Several weeks later, he died at his home in Toronto.

Knopf Canada recently published Getting Lucky, a collection of 10 stories by the late author. The hardcover is available in bookstores for $32.95.

Lonely Planet Middle East travel guides

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Middle East is a fascinating destination, brimming with awesome ancient ruins, colourful and aromatic outdoor markets and scenic vistas.

If you're heading for the Mideast, pick up one of its Lonely Planet guides, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books.

Middle East, bulging with 912 pages, entries on 16 countries ranging from Israel to Libya and a profusion of maps and colour photographs, is an excellent source, comprehensive yet concise.

Istanbul to Cairo on a Shoestring deftly explores six Middle Eastern nations from Egypt to Turkey, and the journey is never less than revealing and enjoyable.

Egypt, an atlas leavened by highlights of its main attractions, is practical and useful.

Syria delves into the country's Roman ruins, Crusader castles, colourful souks and bustling towns and cities.

Dubai describes a country that was once a backwater but that is now a commercial hub and a shoppers' paradise.

If your Hebrew is rusty, don't forget to bring along Hebrew Phrasebook when you go to Israel.

For some 40 days and nights in the winter of 1999, three Canadians and their three Omani Bedu guides trudged through the wastes of the Empty Quarter – the world's largest sand desert – by camel. Their 1,200-kilometre trip, inspired by Wilfred Thesiger's epic 1947 crossing of this remote and dangerous wilderness, comes vividly alive in Sand Dance (McClelland & Stewart), written by Bruce Kirkby, one of the intrepid participants.

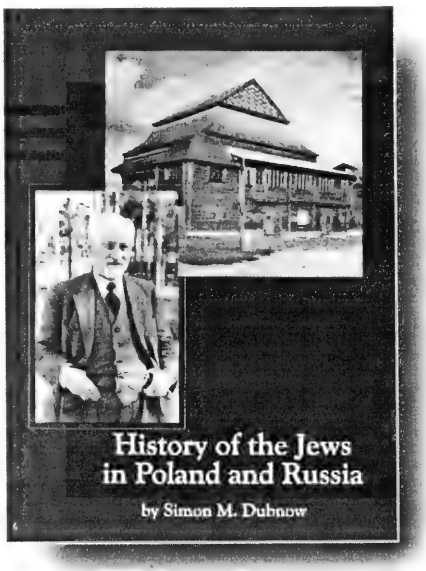
Classic Russian-Jewish history book reissued

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Born in Belarussia, and later a resident of St. Petersburg, Odessa, Kovno and Riga, Simon Dubnow (1860-1941) published his first essay about the Jews of Russia in 1880, and understood at a relatively early age that the subject would remain of particular significance to him.

He wrote in his diary in 1892, "My life's task has become clear to me: to spread historical science and work especially on the history of Russian Jews. I have become a missionary of history."

By that time, he well understood that his self-declared task was too big for one man. That is why, the previous year, he had galvanized the intellectual community with a broad public appeal for assistance in collecting and preserving source material related to the history of the Jews in Russia.



Written specifically for the Jewish Publication Society of America, Dubnow's History of the Jews of Poland and Russia appeared in English translation in three volumes between 1916 and 1920. There were several reprints throughout the century, the most recent being a re-issue by Ktav in 1975.

Now, Avotaynu Inc., the New Jersey-based Jewish genealogical printing house, has presented the latest incarnation of Dubnow's classic in a large, single volume of 600 pages.

Dr. Israel Friedlander's original translation has been reset and enhanced with a more thorough index; without, however, any new maps, illustrations or photographs to illuminate the text.

Dubnow's masterful study opens with early Jewish settlements on the shores of the Black Sea, and continues by methodical chapters to the agitations, disabilities and pogroms that sparked the waves of mass exodus of the late 19th century. His special talent apparently lay in crafting a grand intellectual synthesis without neglecting the small, telling details, which he presents in their full colour. The flavour of original sources is evident on almost every page.

Reviewers have lauded Dubnow for his brilliant writing style, his clear language, his objective yet sympathetic approach to the Jewish people, and his wide-ranging, sociological view of history, not favouring economic, religious or any other aspect above another.

While some reviewers have noted Dubnow's tendency to "compartmentalize" the Jews of Russia, as if the rest of the world didn't exist, this criticism seems contrary to his own theory of Jewish history.

He had become convinced of the unity of the Jewish people, despite the seeming discontinuities of isolated regional Jewish populations.

The diaspora "was not only a possibility but a necessity," he once wrote. "A people small in number but great in quality, situated on the crossroads of the giant nations of Asia and Africa, could not preserve both its state and its nationality, and had perforce to break the barrel in order to preserve the wine – this was the great miracle of mankind."

It is particularly gratifying that Avotaynu has brought out this fresh edition, considering that the Nazis seemed bent on destroying Dubnow and everything he represented. The author was murdered by a Gestapo agent in Riga in 1941; according to the Encyclopedia Judaica, his killer had been a former student of his.

Afterwards, the Nazis burned the third volume of his autobiography in its entirety – every last copy, it seems, but one. It turned up in 1956, allowing a complete edition of the autobiography to roll off the press the following year.

History of the Jews in Poland and Russia costs $69.50 (US) and should be available in Jewish bookstores in Canada.

To order by mail, visit Avotaynu's Web site [www.avotaynu.com].

Computers improve quality of life for the disabled

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Computers are miraculous devices. You can use them to write letters, track your finances, design posters, play games and surf the Internet. And that's just for starters.

There's no end to the type of work and leisure activities you can do on a computer – unless you're not physically able to use a keyboard or handle a mouse. Then it becomes just another frustrating and inaccessible high-tech gizmo that other people use.

ALS (amyotrophic lateral sclerosis) patients, quadriplegics and those suffering from multiple sclerosis are among those who lack the motor skills to interface easily with computers. But over the past six years, a clinic in Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Science Centre has addressed that problem.

The Assistive Technology Clinic (ASC), located in Sunnybrook's Centre for Independent Living (SCIL), provides the physically disabled with the tools they need to use computers productively.

Headed by Pearl Gryfe, ASC's clinical and managing director, the clinic includes a team of 11 full-time and part-time therapists and computer specialists.

The clinic, which treats 400 to 500 patients a year, operates on a $500,000 budget, financed by donations and matching funds from the Ministry of Health. About half of its clients suffer from ALS (Lou Gherig's disease), 40 percent from multiple sclerosis and the rest have a variety of ills, Gryfe said.

The clinic's goal is to help clients improve their quality of life and give them some functional independence. Some even return to work as a result of the computer interfaces developed for them, she said.

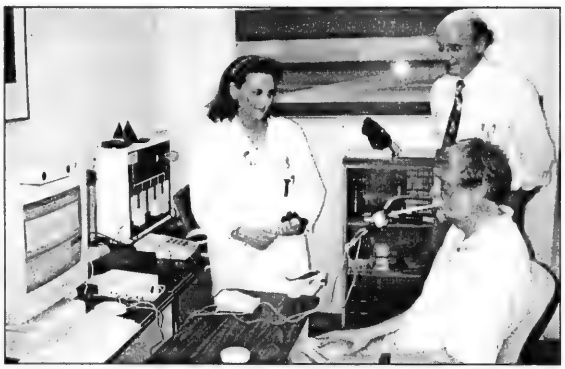
ALS affects the central nervous system, "rendering victims unable to move, to speak and unable to eat or breath except through artificial means." Though the body has withered, patients' minds are still sharp.

"They're a brain trapped inside their bodies," Gryfe explained.

Employing a team approach to treatment, the clinic's occupational and physical therapists assess each client and technologists design suitable interfaces.

"We match the technology with the pathology," Gryfe said. "We assess the client physically to see how they can access the computer … and the technicians work the magic."

Gord Laiken has been with the clinic for five years and is second only to Gryfe in seniority. A computer expert who worked for many years as a mainframes systems programmer for an insurance company, he was intrigued by the prospect of helping disabled people use computers.



John Hogerwaard (seated), environmental control specialist at the clinic, demonstrates use of a puffer to control the computer, while Pearl Gryfe and Gord Laiken look on. [Paul Lungen photo]

Laiken scours the computer world for innovative technologies and he provides each with the appropriate interface.

"We keep track of the technology available, see what's already been used… We add on to PCs (personal computers) with specialized hardware and software," he said.

"There's a list of computer products that can be used as an alternative to a mouse. It's like going to a custom tailor."

Some accessibility options are already bundled with Microsoft's operating system (large print, "sticky" mouse), but Laiken is able to design interfaces for people who are profoundly disabled. Their only motor skill may be the ability to move their head, or twitch their cheek muscles, or puff into a straw-like device, or simply blink their eyes.

With proper design, almost any bodily movement can be used to trigger a switch that operates a cursor on the computer screen.

The clinic employs some of the most advanced technology available, Laiken said. One interface, developed by the military, involves using monitors to measure eye movements, muscle activity and brain waves. Called Brain Interface Technology, the clinic has tried to adapt it "but it doesn't work that well," Laiken said.

Gryfe developed the idea behind the clinic years ago when, working as an occupational therapist, she operated a wheelchair clinic at the hospital.

Hoping to make patients more mobile, she contacted IBM, Apple Computer and other high-tech companies for assistance in developing devices that could be adapted for wheelchairs. At the time, the seating clinic treated about 10 -20 ALS patients but it was enough to get noticed by SCIL management, which asked her to set up a special clinic.

One of the new clinic's first patients was an employee of drug manufacturer Apotex. Along with the Samuel Lunenfeld Charitable Foundation, Apotex subsequently provided funding for the clinic.

Today, the clinic receives financial support from the ALS Society of Metro Toronto and Area; the ALS Society of Ontario; the Sunnybrook Foundation; the Ontario Ministry of Health; and Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Science Centre.

Lieberman's wife child of survivors

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Minutes after the official announcement that her husband would be the first Jewish vice-presidential candidate on a major ticket, Hadassah Lieberman stepped on the national stage.

"Here I am the daughter of survivors from the Holocaust, the most horrendous thing that happened," she said last Tuesday, standing with Democratic presidential candidate Al and Tipper Gore, and her husband, Senator Joseph Lieberman, at a World War II memorial in Nashville.

"And here I am in the place that commemorates the American heroes, the soldiers who actually liberated my mother in Dachau and Auschwitz."

Born Hadassah Freilich in post-war Czechoslovakia, Lieberman is the daughter of two Holocaust survivors. Her mother, Ella, survived both Auschwitz and Dachau and her father, Samuel, survived a Nazi labour camp. The family came to the United States in the early 1950s, when she was 3 years old.

Lieberman, 52, grew up in Gardner, Mass., where her father served as a congregational rabbi.

A graduate of Boston University, Lieberman has spent most of her career doing public relations on health-related issues. Until recently, she worked for the National Research Council, linking American corporations to mathematics and science education reform. She has also worked with the Hospital of Saint Raphael in New Haven, Conn., and for Pfizer, the national pharmaceutical company.

Israeli tennis player Levy shines at tournament

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Pete Sampras, the current Wimbledon tennis champion, often states the men's pro tennis circuit has to promote its young stars to attract new fans. His words proved prophetic at the $2.9-million Tennis Masters Series-Canada tournament, held recently at the National Tennis Centre at York University.

Unknown Israeli Harel Levy became an instant star by finishing as runner-up to tournament champion Marat Safin of Russia. Levy, a 22-year-old journeyman who averaged $1,000 weekly in his three-year career, earned $211,000 (US) in one week in Toronto. By finishing as a finalist, Levy improved his world ranking from 133rd to 60th. Prior to the tournament, Levy earned $152,000 (US) over his career.

Levy's performance stunned his opponents – and himself. Because of his low ranking, the Israeli had to qualify into the tournament's main draw and he did not expect to advance beyond the first or second round. Instead, the longshot advanced further than top seeds Andre Agassi, Patrick Rafter and Sampras through a combination of grit, outstanding execution of shots, and by capitalizing on his opportunities.

In a week that seemed to be scripted by Hollywood, Levy defeated seven higher-ranked opponents. His victims were, in order, Canada's Chris Gotek 6-2, 6-4; James Sekulov of Austria 1-6, 6-3, 6-1; Czech Martin Damm 7-6 (7-5), 4-6, 6-3; Austrian Stefan Koubek 6-1, 6-3; Sebastien Grosjean of France 6-3, 3-6, 6-3; Jerome Golmard, also of France, 6-4, 6-4; and Jiri Novak of the Czech Republic 6-3, 1-6, 6-4; before losing the title match to Safin 6-2, 6-3.

Levy raised the level of his game as he advanced round-by-round. His great play at the net, with no less than four sizzling backhand passing shots, left Martin Damm dispirited in the third set of their match. Against Grosjean, Levy fired four aces (clocked at 126 km/hr) and a high first serve percentage to seal the match in three sets.

By the semi-final round, the buzz around the stadium was that Levy was a dangerous foe who was thrilling to watch.

His semi-final match proved to be dramatic. Levy celebrated his 22nd birthday and he flew his father, Yoel, a jewelry importer, and his coach, Oded Jacob, to Toronto from Tel Aviv, specifically to watch his match against Novak.

Instead of choking, the young Israeli rose to the occasion and made his birthday the most memorable of his life. Before a sold out crowd of 10,000 and an international television audience (the matches were televised in Canada, the United States and Israel), Levy was pumped with the crowd adoring his every move. The atmosphere on court resembled a Davis Cup match held in Jerusalem,with choruses of "Levy, Levy", Israeli flags, and the singing of Hatikvah by many fans

Levy fired bullets, with aces and outstanding backhand shots to break Novak twice for a 5-0 lead in the first set. But Novak kept on fighting, despite losing the first set 6-3. He opened the second set with a break and added two more to force the deciding third set as Levy felt the pressure, committing 11 unforced errors, seven more than Novak.

That prompted Levy to change his game plan and come to the net more behind his serve. The change in tactics earned him the victory.

The final set came to a climax in the ninth game with a Levy drop shot over the net breaking Novak for a 5-4 lead. At match point, Levy clinched the win by pursuing a short Novak shot and putting it into the open court.

At the moment of victory, Levy pumped his fists, then went directly to his father's courtside seat to embrace him with several hugs.

The crowd support may have been the most passionate display of affection for an Israeli athlete ever by Torontonians.

"I had the dream of my life today with this victory. I know there is a big Jewish community here, so probably a lot of Jewish or even Israeli people came out today and [their] support was great. It really helped me," said Levy , who saluted the crowd and through tennis balls to the spectators after the match. He then celebrated his birthday with a cake and a few drinks in the player's lounge.

Born on a kibbutz, Levy was ranked number one in Israel following the retirement of Amos Mansdorf in 1996. Last month, he finished serving his third and final year in the army. His mother, Nitza, is a nurse and he has two sisters, Ofri, 19, and Stav, 12.

The final proved to be anticlimactic for Levy, despite the overwhelming support of the crowd, including two young men who took their shirts off and painted the flag of Israel on their chests and faces. Safin, the eighth-seeded Russian, was overpowering, with serves clocking in at more than 200 km/hr. He never lost control of the match. Levy learned that to advance from 60th rank to the top 10, is a long climb.

"My dream came true, especially because so many in Israel were asking when I am going to be in the top 100. Now my goal is to be in the top 50. I will work hard to realize my next dream," said Levy, who will never forget his nine days in Toronto.

Toronto tennis fans may never forget Levy either. Despite the absence of Agassi, Rafter and Sampras in the final, Levy won the hearts of the record 137,680 tournament spectators by his hustle, persistence and show of emotion on the court.

Levy's semifinal victory ensured him a place in the record books of this 110-year-old tournament. He was the first Israeli to make the finals and the first Jewish finalist since 1990, when American Jay Berger achieved the feat.

TENNIS LINES... Canadian David Abelson of Montreal, the top ranked Jewish player nationally, didn't get past the opening round of qualifying, losing to Lionel Roux of France 7-6 (8-6), 6-2... Anna Smashnova,the former Soviet Jew who is Israel's top female player, won a July tournament in Belgium. She is scheduled to compete at the Du Maurier Open in Montreal from August 12-21...American Paul Goldstein, ranked 70th on the men's pro tennis circuit, did not compete at the Tennis Masters-Canada tournament because of injuries.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I'm going to have my bar mitzvah in a couple of weeks and although I am very excited about it, I am also very nervous! I don't really want to sing in front of all of my family and friends in shul. I'm afraid that I am just going to mess up my portion and look stupid. I have been to all of my older cousins' bar and bat mitzvahs and they were all so good when it came to reading Torah, but I am not sure that I will be so confident. I have been learning my portion for about six months, but I still feel really nervous about singing in front of the whole congregation. I know that at your bar mitzvah, you are supposed to be a man, but I really don't feel like it – especially when I have to go up in front of so many people and sing! Is there anything that I can do to make me less nervous?

Bar Mitzvah Blues

Dear Bar Mitzvah,

Mazal tov on your bar mitzvah! A bar mitzvah is a very important time in a Jewish boy's life, and you should be very excited about this as well as your future, where you are recognized as a man in Judaism. All of us are nervous at our bar or bat mitzvah, because the focus is on us. You are going to have to do your best in front of lots of people, but the truth is that all of those people will know you, care about you, and be extremely proud of you.

Everyone gets nervous before being put in the spotlight. Even great musicians and athletes are nervous each time they walk onto a stage or playing field.

If you are feeling some level of stage fright, or perhaps the more appropriate term would be "bimah fright," you should try singing your portion in front of an audience, even if its just your parents, your dog or a couple friends. Try to sing in front of an attentive audience and see how you feel.

You could even work your way up from there, practising in front of your whole family. I am sure that your older cousins would be delighted to listen to you to help you out.

Good luck at your bar mitzvah and don't be nervous! I am sure you will do a great job and make you and your family very proud.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto.

Israel erred on int'l court: Cotler

Could have modified provision aimed at the Jewish State

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel made a key tactical error during the multilateral negotiations in Rome that established an International Criminal Court (ICC), an international law conference was told last week. As a result, the war crimes offences covered in the Rome Treaty include a provision that appears to be directed specifically at Israel.

Canadian MP Irwin Cotler and U.S. lawyer Jerome Shestack agreed Israel erred during the Rome negotiations. "Many in Israel thought Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) did not have the power to supersede the wishes of the United States," Cotler said.

"Israel made a mistake in its negotiating tactics and the United States made a monumental mistake," Shestack added.

Cotler and Shestack were speaking at a conference of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists (IAJLJ). The meeting, which was held in Canada for the first time since the IAJLJ was founded in 1969, brought together about 200 lawyers, professors and judges from across the globe. Participants hailed from Canada, the United States, Israel, Argentina, Britain, France, Germany, Austria, South Africa, Costa Rica, Brazil, Greece, Italy and Switzerland.

The conference theme this year was, Pursuing Justice in the Global Village.

Irwin Cotler

In the months leading up to the event, the conference was touted as a key development for the IAJLJ. "It signifies a desire of the association to bring it to the attention of many more lawyers and jurists in North America who are interested in the association's work," said conference chair Igor Ellyn.

However, in the aftermath of the event, Ellyn's feelings were mixed. "The conference overall was very successful. The disappointment of the organizers was that considering the potential of a niche market of Jewish jurists, lawyers and law professors, we didn't attract more than the delegates we got. The organizers are puzzled why we didn't get more people."

Ellyn estimated there are as many as 30,000 Jewish lawyers within a two-hour radius of Toronto, including New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. Despite the poor attendance, he felt "the [IAJLJ's] exposure was increased even if people didn't register."

With a break-even figure of 400, the conference will run a deficit, though it's too early to give a specific figure, Ellyn said.

MONTREAL — The Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) data bank, which has over 300,000 articles with current and historical information on the Middle East and Jewish life around the world can be accessed through the CIJR's Web site at www.isranet.org.

ISRAEL

More Shoah Remarks

JERUSALEM — For the second time in a week, the Shas party has sparked a public outcry over remarks about the Holocaust. Shas MK Shlomo Benizri was quoted by the Israeli daily Ma'ariv as claiming that the Zionist movement abandoned Europe's religious Jews to perish at the hands of the Nazis. Benizri also defended the party's spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, who came under widespread criticism in Israel and abroad after he said last week that Holocaust victims were the reincarnated souls of sinners.

Secular Jews Upset

JERUSALEM — Israel's new president tried to smooth over a flap that erupted over remarks he made about secular Jews, in an interview with an Orthodox newspaper. Moshe Katsav, who took office three weeks ago, promising to promote unity, was quoted as saying that "if secularism dominated in the past hundreds of years, we would have long ago disintegrated and dispersed." Katsav later said his remarks were taken out of context.

WORLD

Families Sue

LOS ANGELES — Families of the victims of a white supremacist's 1999 shooting spree at the North Valley Jewish Community Centre near here have filed a lawsuit against gun makers, saying they should be held responsible for the incident. The suit alleges that six firearms manufacturers are liable for "public nuisance and negligence" and failure to take steps to prevent criminals such as alleged gunman Buford O'Neal Furrow Jr. from obtaining firearms.

New Envoy

AMMAN — Jordan has named a former intelligence general as its ambassador to Israel. Abdul-Illah al-Kurdi is Jordan's third envoy to Israel since diplomatic relations were established after the 1994 peace treaty. Kurdi, in his mid-50s, is a general who served with Jordan's secret service for nearly two decades.

Birthright Program

NEW YORK — The Birthright Israel program plans to send 7,500 young Jews to Israel this winter. The free 10-day trips, which will begin in December and January, are open to any Jewish adult between 18 and 26 who has never been to Israel as part of an educational program. Those interested in registering can contact the organization at www.birthrightisrael.com before the Oct. 5 deadline.

Man Ordered Out

NEW YORK — A U.S. immigration judge ordered the deportation of an 84-year-old retired auto mechanic to Germany to face charges that he served as an armed guard at the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Michael Gruber, who resides in Rockland County, N.Y., admitted serving as an SS guard in Oranienburg, Germany, but denied knowing that there was a concentration camp there.

War Crimes Parley

RIGA — Latvia plans to host a meeting of international experts next month to discuss the cases against two men suspected of Nazi war crimes, Konrad Kalejs and Karlis Ozols. The meeting will be a follow-up to one held in February with experts from Canada, the United States, Britain, Germany, Israel and Australia. Latvian prosecutors have been investigating the wartime activities of both suspects, who are originally from Latvia and now live in Australia.

Salvage Fails

ATHENS — Members of a salvage operation failed to find a sunken boat believed to be loaded with gold and jewelry taken from Greek Jews during World War II. After five days of searching, members of the team said they found no sign of the valuables, said to be worth more than $2 billion.

Putin's Meetings

MOSCOW — Russian President Vladimir Putin met with the editors of two anti-Semitic newspapers, according to the Washington-based Union of Councils for Soviet Jews. The Aug. 10 meeting was "part of a disturbing pattern," the council said. It indicates that Putin "apparently doesn't see the promotion of anti-Semitism as a litmus test for political legitimacy."

Probing Rabbi's Threats Against Lieberman

WASHINGTON — FBI investigators are looking into possible death threats by a controversial New York rabbi directed at vice-presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman for his position on the Jonathan Pollard spy case.

Rabbi Mordechai Friedman, president of the American Board of Rabbis, a small Orthodox movement, said because Lieberman does not support Pollard's release from prison, Lieberman should be excommunicated from the Jewish faith.

Pollard is serving a life sentence for spying for Israel.

On his televised talk show in July, Rabbi Friedman suggested that Jewish law allows for the assassination of a Jew who turns a fellow Jew over to gentiles. Rabbi Friedman has since called for Lieberman's resignation but says he did not threaten the senator's life.

Still, the FBI, Capitol Police in Washington and police in Connecticut are beefing up security around Lieberman's Washington office and Connecticut home, the Associated Press reported.

Rabbi Friedman's remarks were denounced by other Orthodox groups.

Beilin optimistic about peace with Palestinians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yossi Beilin, Israel's dovish justice minister, is cautiously optimistic that Israel and the Palestinians can reach an historic peace agreement that most Israelis would support in a referendum.

Speaking here about three weeks after the collapse of the Camp David summit in the United States, he rated the chances of success at 51 percent.

One of the architects of the Oslo peace process, Beilin warned that the window of opportunity is fast closing. "In the coming weeks, we'll have to take bold decisions," he said, adding that the era of "false slogans" has passed.

Beilin made his remarks at two venues – a breakfast sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA FEDERATION and at a meeting with reporters at the Israeli consulate.

Officially here to deliver a keynote speech to the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, Beilin met with U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and President Bill Clinton's national security advisor, Samuel Berger, before flying to Toronto from Washington, D.C.

Declaring that the "moment of truth" is at hand, Beilin said that Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PLO chair Yasser Arafat have until September to sign a deal.

The tight deadline is dictated by several factors, Beilin observed. Clinton's term is ending, the Palestinians are threatening to declare unilateral statehood, and Barak's coalition government is teetering.

"I hope we have the courage, the creative ideas and the help of the Arab world to move forward."

Beilin doubts whether the Palestinians will reject Israel's "generous" terms to end the conflict. They may never again see an Israeli government as moderate as Barak's.

Pointing out that the two sides have never been closer to resolving their core differences, Beilin declared, "For the first time, we put our cards on the table."

Beilin suggested that a follow-up American-sponsored summit, lasting no more than a couple of days, remains a distinct possibility.

The key issues yet to be resolved are security, borders, a Palestinian state, settlements, Palestinian refugees and Jerusalem.

Israel's justice minister addresses legal conference

see page 14

Yossi Beilin

Jerusalem will be the toughest nut to crack, but it is not an "insurmountable" issue, Beilin said.

At Camp David, Barak and Arafat made two crucial concessions. Barak expressed a willingness to cede 28 Arab villages annexed by Israel in the greater Jerusalem area, while Arafat acknowledged that 11 Jewish neighbourhoods built by Israel in eastern Jerusalem since the 1967 Six Day War are in fact Israeli.

The thorniest issue in Jerusalem is the status of the walled Old City, with its array of Jewish, Muslim and Christian holy places. Such is its contentiousness that the Palestinians still do not grasp the importance of the Temple Mount – the site of the First and Second Temples – for Jews, Beilin said.

Some kind of "joint regime" may be the answer in the Old City, he said.

Saying it is in Israel's interest to reach an understanding with the Palestinians on Jerusalem, Beilin noted, "We're the only country in the world without a recognized capital. Why should we be so? Without negotiations, we won't have a recognized capital."

A breakthrough on Jerusalem will make it easier for Israel and the Palestinians to solve the remainder of their problems, he speculated.

Chief among them is the Palestinian refugee issue, the "reddest" of red lines. For demographic reasons, Israel cannot and will not admit Palestinian Arabs displaced by the 1948 war.

"If we agree to absorb the refugees, it is the end of the Jewish state."

Palestinian leaders understand Israel's objection, but they have yet to convey this message to their people. At Camp David, Beilin disclosed, Palestinian negotiators fought for a formula that would appear to give the refugees the right to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

In his view, the impasse over refugees can be broken through the mechanism of a compensation plan and by their resettlement in an independent Palestinian state.

Turning to a related topic, Beilin said that Israel wants to annex three Jewish settlement blocs, with 80 percent of the settlers, in the West Bank.

Two righteous women

From the editor's desk

Ono San Pietro is a small village in the very north of Italy, a short distance from the Alpine peaks where the borders of Italy, Switzerland and Austria converge.

The village is in picturesque Valle Camonica, one of a number of fairy-tale like valleys in this northernmost region of Italy. The red tile roofs of the village nestle into the side of the lusciously verdant mountain terrain like a sorority of ladybugs resting in a green patch of grass. The contrasting colours are a comfort to the eye, even as the vast upward sweep of the jagged mountain peaks are an inspiration to the soul.

Ono lies, literally, in the shadow of the Concarena, the highest of the peaks in the Alpine ridge of mountains that encase the valley.

Fewer than a thousand people live in Ono. The villagers make their living mostly by the produce they grow in their gardens or by the income they manage to bring home from jobs outside the village. Life there is relatively uncomplicated.

Except for the politely curious questioning of two Canadian visitors, invited to the village by the local priest, a teacher, scholar and expert in the Jewish history of the region, English is little heard in Ono's steeply winding, narrow streets.

One evening, three weeks ago, the priest arranged for the Canadian guests to meet two of his parishioners, Caterina and Antonia Formentalli. They are sisters, 83 and 85 years of age, respectively, both single.

One is struck immediately by the blueness of their eyes. Like a friendly beam of visible azure radar, the greeting in their eyes locks onto the visitors from Canada and takes hold of the Canadians' emotions.

The two middle-aged visitors from Canada and the two elderly sisters from Ono shake hands and kiss.

Fifty-seven years ago, during the evil maelstrom of World War 2, the two sisters and their brother Sandro, since deceased, saved the lives of two Jews.

Some 50,000 Jews lived in Italy in 1943. More than 10,000 were refugees from Germany and Austria. Most of the Jews lived in Italy's large cities: Rome, Milan, Trieste, Florence, Turin, Genoa and Venice. The fascist Italian government had imposed legislative restrictions on the Jews, but they had prevented their deportation and extermination.

In late 1943 the situation changed. After the Mussolini regime collapsed on Sept. 16, the Nazis took control of the country. Roundups and deportations of Jews started immediately. By the end of the war, 8,000 of Italy's approximately 40,000 Jews had been slaughtered by the Nazis.

Sylvia Rivera was a translator/interpreter in Turin. Like every other Italian Jew suddenly faced with trying to escape the crushing grip of the barbaric, Nazi hand, she had to run for her life.

She ran to Ono where she found shelter and safety in the home of the three Formentalli siblings. As we know from similar wartime stories, it was more than generosity that the Formentalli siblings extended towards the Riveras. It was courage and resolve; it was kindness and humanity. It was light amid total darkness.

The Nazis, who were headquartered in the region in nearby Brenno, a town significantly larger than Ono, sent out daily patrols into the villages and towns of the valleys, bloodlusting hunters craving Jewish prey. And when they found their quarry, as we know, they also destroyed the shelterers along with the sheltered.

In a certain sense therefore, it was the entire village of Ono San Pietro that sheltered Sylvia and her father. Everyone in the tiny village knew that Jews were hiding in the Formentalli home. Everyone in the tiny village had a hand in stretching the precious, barely sustaining rations of food toward the two Jewish strangers among them.

After the war Sylvia and her father returned to Turin. All of their family had been killed by the Nazis. Sylvia stayed in touch with the two Formentalli sisters in Ono until she died in 1988.

Caterina and Antonia Formentalli

When asked by the Canadians why they hid the Jews, Caterina answered for her sister as well: "It was necessary to help. We did it for the sense of right."

Life in Ono San Pietro is relatively uncomplicated. The people lead simple lives. The vast upward sweep of the jagged mountain peaks, into whose luscious verdant terrain the houses of the tiny village nestle like a sorority of ladybugs, are an inspiration to the soul.

So too are its people.

Canadian teens caught up in alleged drug case

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Several young Canadians taking part in a youth program in Israel were called as witnesses in a drug case earlier this month, after allegedly buying drugs from an Israeli seller.

The young Canadians, all 17, were part of the Biluim Israel program. They have all been returned to their parents.

Officials were tight-lipped last week, but some details about the youths' misadventures emerged.

According to Adam Minsky of the Canada Israel Experience Centre in Toronto, the incident took place in Kochav Yair, a community near Tel Aviv well known for being where Prime Minister Ehud Barak lives.

Minsky said the Canadian participants in Biluim Israel were taking part in a joint program with Israeli youths. He said several youths were approached by an Israeli who was selling drugs. Allegedly, the youths agreed to the sale and were caught using the drugs by local authorities.

Minsky said the Canadian youths were not permitted to leave the country until they gave evidence against the seller.

David Altshuller, director of the Biluim Israel program for Canadian Young Judaea in Israel, told The CJN that the teens were not arrested.

The youths came from across Canada. He would not say how many were involved.

"I've returned them to their parents. They're back in Canada," Altshuller said in a telephone interview, adding that "some of them were material witnesses" in the case. He would not confirm whether the teens were allowed to leave Israel until they co-operated.

Altshuller said the youths, all of them Canadian, were not kicked off the six-week program, which brought 130 Canadian 17-year-olds to Israel.

He said "some" of the youths involved in the incident "did nothing wrong."

He said he was under a lawyer's instructions not to say anything further.

Biluim Israel is the culmination of the Canadian Young Judaea program, which operates several summer camps in Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and British Columbia.

Risa Epstein, executive director of Canadian Young Judaea, had no comment on the incident.

Ben Hillel takes over as Israeli vice-consul

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Zehavit Ben Hillel's earliest memories is of being taken to a bomb shelter as a two-year-old during the Yom Kippur War in 1973.

Being a diplomat affords her a modest way of making a contribution toward peace, she believes.

"I love to see how something small that one of us is doing can contribute to better relations between Israel and [another] country. It's the small things that can make the whole picture," said the new vice-consul at Israel's Consulate General in Toronto.

Ben Hillel, 29, has always been curious about other cultures and "how the whole thing works," she said in an interview in the office she took over in mid-July.

Her career has already taken her to Angola and Costa Rica for short-term postings, and more recently to Lima, Peru, where she served as second secretary at the Israeli Embassy for two years before moving here.

As a teenager, she participated in Israel in a program with North American teens, including some from Toronto.

A native of Nes Ziona, Ben Hillel has a secular background. In fact, it wasn't until age 21, when she worked as an Israeli cultural counsellor at a Jewish overnight camp outside of Philadelphia, that she learned blessings like the Hamotzi and Birkat Hamazon.

Zehavit Ben Hillel

Her late father's family made aliyah in 1896 from White Russia. Her mother's family left Poland in the 1920s for Belgium, and in 1935 immigrated to Israel.

Coincidentally, both her grandfathers adopted the same Hebraicized surname in honour of their respective fathers, replacing their original names (Becker and Moksky) with the more Israeli-sounding Ben Hillel.

"Our Jewishness is very much connected to [our] roots, history, language, literature and culture," she said.

Ben Hillel is currently working on her master's degree in contemporary Jewish studies at the Institute of Contemporary Jewry at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where she completed her BA in international relations in 1995.

For "fun," as a third-year student, she studied Spanish, continuing her education through a summer course in Spain and with twice-weekly lessons in Lima, a city with a "still very lively" Jewish community of 3,000.

She is excited at the prospect of experiencing a Canadian winter, remembering a rare snowfall in Jerusalem, when she was a student there. Her mother woke her with a 6:30 a.m. phone call to alert her to the unusual weather.

Climate aside, Ben Hillel is very taken with Toronto's cleanliness, multicultural diversity, the Art Gallery of Ontario and bookstores. Among her preferred reading material are mysteries, Yiddish literature in translation, and books on art or Jewish history.

She is still learning about the Canadian Jewish community (the consulate's purview extends to the west coast), and was looking forward to upcoming speaking engagements as well as involvement with international film festivals and other cultural events.

One of her favourite examples of contemporary Israeli culture is a song called The Winter of '73. The words tell of children born after the Yom Kippur war – Ben Hillel's generation – and of the hopefulness of their parents, who told their children they wouldn't have to enter the army. Now, 20 years later, the song continues, and the children have to make the same promise to their children.

In light of recent negotiations at Camp David, "we're hopeful" about the peace process, Ben Hillel said, sighing softly. "It feels kind of like it's now or never."

Noting that "most of the crucial points" have been resolved, and that there are still a few weeks left to achieve a more definitive agreement, Ben Hillel said she hopes that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat, "with the assistance of our friends in the United States and other countries, can actually do it... I really want [the next generation] to have a peaceful and tranquil future."

Israeli columnist says peace treaty could lead to future problems

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A peace treaty between Israel and the Palestinians may be possible now, but five years down the road, when the Palestinians have taken over Jordan and have control of the Golan and the Jordan Valley, who knows if Israel will have the technological strength to stand against them, says Jonathan Rosenblum, a Jerusalem Post columnist.

Rosenblum, also an author and Jewish Observer contributor, expressed this pessimistic view to The CJN at a luncheon address to a group of lawyers in downtown Toronto.

Arafat buying time to destroy Israel

A 1977 graduate of Yale Law School, Rosenblum is also director of Am Echad Jewish Media Resources, and of the Centre for Law, Society and Democracy in Israel. He has lived in Israel for 21 years.

Yasser Arafat, he said, wants to trade land for peace, for land for time – in effect, buying time for the Palestinians to be strong enough to destroy the state of Israel.

What happened at the recent Camp David summit, he said, "should have alerted Israel. If Barak was offering what no Arab expected even in 1993 [at the Oslo meetings] – and even then Arafat couldn't sign an agreement – was there really a partner to discuss peace with?"

Not only does Rosenblum believe that it is very likely that war will break out, but "there is the fear that a highly armed Egypt will join in."

It is foolish to count on the United States, he said. "When U.S. business interests conflict with Israeli interests," Israel won't win, Rosenblum warned.

People should realize that "98 percent of Palestinians live under self rule right now," and they are being fed a constant diet of anti-Israel rhetoric in schools, summer camps and in the Arab media, he said, adding that "no Arab map of the Middle East has Israel mentioned on it."

Time is on their side, Rosenblum said. "They see Israel's desire for peace as a sign of weakness."

If war does break out, he warned, "Jews will be targeted all over the world."

Rosenblum does not appear to have great faith in Israeli political leaders, describing both former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu and current Prime Minister Ehud Barak as men of "tremendous intellect and no ethical values at all."

He also does not agree with much of the media coverage of the Orthodox community.

As an example, he cited the extensive coverage of the arson of a Conservative shul, by "baalei tshuvah with long criminal records."

On the other hand, in 1997 and 1998, "there were 32 attacks on Orthodox institutions. There was no coverage by the press, [and] no concern expressed by the Israeli government, U.S. federations or the Jewish Agency."

There is no interest in showing the Orthodox as victims, he charged. As to American federations, "that doesn't serve their interests concerning pluralism."

He accused the media of consistently biased reporting, citing for example, how they ignored the questioning of the finances of Shimon Peres' Peace Institute while lambasting Ezer Weizman's financial woes; concentrated on Shas MK Arye Deri's wrong-doings and ignored those of a leftist member of the Knesset; and criticized Likud's actions while they applauded similar Labour party's moves.

Nevertheless, he said, speaking as an Orthodox Jew, "I would still choose life in Israel."

In each of the last two years, he said, "5,000 non-frum children have been enrolled in religious schools, in spite of Yossi Sarid's threats to close down any more schools that open. In Har Nof (a neighbourhood in Jerusalem), there are 2,500 religious families."

Steps are being taken to slowly integrate haredim into the economic life of the country. "We need to emphasize the notion of a working ben Torah (someone who is gainfully employed and still makes time to study)."

What will be our sustaining vision?

Political boundaries generally follow natural economic relationships. A modern-day exception to this rule has been Canada. Canada was founded against the grain, so to speak. The long latitudinal political border joining the Atlantic to the Pacific does not follow the natural economic relationships of the continent, which have always been north and south.

Reconciling and harmonizing the opposite flows of the political and the economic lines of this country was the very essence of the nation-building challenge that the founding fathers undertook. They called that essence Canada.

In their wisdom and over the course of the unfolding years, the founders of the country fashioned three instruments with which to try to achieve that harmony: a strong centralized federal government; the fiscal authority to foster strong, distinct regional economies; and the social policy authority to ameliorate significant societal disparities among the regions that arose because of the distinct regional economies.

The instruments never worked perfectly. There were always regional resentments. The federal government was either fiscally "over-reaching" or socially "under-reaching." Still, during the first 11 decades of the country, despite the imperfections of the instruments and the constitutional litigation that set the limits of power between competing provincial and federal governments, there was a broad consensus throughout the land that the essence we called Canada was something different from its southern neighbour, deeply endearing and deeply precious, a sustaining vision for the way different peoples might live together, with concern for the wellbeing of the other enshrined into the very law of the land alongside individual rights and freedoms.

Over the past two decades however, due to the confluence of a series of factors, there has been a slow, incremental, but irrefutable erosion in that broad consensus. The nasty display of temper at the recent premiers' meeting in Winnipeg between two of the Atlantic premiers and the Alberta premier, ostensibly over the issue of equalization payments, was but the latest proof. The unabating calls for the decentralization of federal authority is another.

Canada is in transition. But where is it headed? What will be the defining essence of the Canada of tomorrow? Is the Canadian essence to be merely a replica of the American essence? What values will sustain the uniquely Canadian vision for the way different peoples might live together with concern for the wellbeing of the other enshrined into the law of the land? These are questions that must be debated by all Canadians, not only by politicians and not only in the context of an election campaign.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Historical revisionism never justified

To paraphrase Joseph Goebbels, the propaganda minister for Nazi Germany, the bigger the lie and the more often it is told, the more people will believe it. Such is the case from virtually every Arab letter-writer in the daily press alleging the violent expulsion of Arabs from the western part of Jerusalem in 1948.

What is never mentioned by Arab writers is that with the creation of Israel and its attack from all sides by its Arab neighbours, Arab leadership called on Arabs to leave, with a promise that they would be returned once the Israelis were driven into the sea.

Nor do Arab letter-writers talk about the Arab occupation of east Jerusalem from 1948 to 1967 and the desecration of Jewish gravestones and holy sites and the refusal to allow Jews to visit the sacred Western Wall.

The ultimate resolution of the status of Jerusalem is not helped by the Pope's calling for Jerusalem to be made an international city without recognizing that since 1967, Jews, Christians and Muslims have had access to all their religious sites.

Ultimately, there will be a resolution, notwithstanding the passions connected with Jerusalem, but there is never any justification for historical revisionism.

A spectre of violence

It was 52 years ago that the State of Israel was created and many people today inside and outside the country are voicing concerns over the failure of the recent Middle East summit. The peace process is apparently continuing in spite of the rejection of co-existence by terrorist groups and rejectionist Arab countries.

Israel is battling one of her worst political turmoils internally and calamity and hate media externally.

The spectre of violence is again rolling over Israel. Attacks by extremists have erupted throughout the country and rendered the Knesset inoperative. Unless a strong coalition is quickly hammered together, the national courage needed to resolve the Mideast issue will not be there to close the irreconcible gaps.

Correcting article re: Stoutenburg

On July 27, you published an article written by Myron Love reporting that Dr. Dennis Stoutenburg would be heading up a project to translate Midrash Raba, to be published jointly by the Catholic Liturgical Press and the Jewish Publication Society (JPS). I would like to correct several errors in the article, foremost of which is that JPS has signed no formal agreement either with Stoutenberg or with Liturgical Press. In fact, after considerable discussion with Liturgical Press, JPS has decided not to go ahead with this project at this time.

Parable applies to Jerusalem

The Bible tells of two women who laid claim to one child. They brought their problem before King Solomon, who, after much thought, declared that the solution was to split the child in two, with each woman to receive one part. One of the "mothers" agreed. The other said that rather than harm the child, she would give up her claim. In his wisdom, Solomon decreed that the latter was the true mother, and that the child belonged to her.

In 1948, the Arab forces, highly superior in armaments and numbers, captured the eastern portion of Jerusalem.

In the war of 1967, Israel asked Jordan to refrain from entering the conflict, assuring King Hussein that the status quo would be maintained. Seeing the little country with its back against the wall, Jordan joined the other Arab states and together they all jumped on Israel.

During the fighting in Jerusalem, the Arab forces used any and every means of destruction obtainable, smashing, burning and destroying everything in their way. The Israelis, finally returning to the long-forbidden streets of their ancient capital, used the opposite tactics. Inching their way through the streets, they gave up many, many lives in hand-to-hand combat, forgoing surer and more direct methods that would have added to the damage and the destruction of the city. Their aim was to protect Jerusalem and to keep the city intact.

Now, I ask: To whom does Jerusalem belong?

High school erred in inviting Day

I was horrified to see that a Jewish institution like Beth Jacob High School for girls would permit someone like Stockwell Day to address an audience in its facilities ("Day is sympathetic to funding burden," CJN, June 15). Day is supported by several evangelical groups, and many of them support messianic missions.

Day opposes abortion and extending rights to homosexuals. He proposes cuts to national health care. His tax cuts would impoverish more Canadians while enriching the most wealthy.

200th birthday of Rabbi Shmuel David Luzatto

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

Among Jewish men of thought who are of the rationalist school, it is virtually axiomatic that their model is Maimonides (Rambam), and he is the authority who sets the standard.

But one outstanding writer constitutes the exception to this rule – Rabbi Shmuel David Luzatto, known by his acronym of Shadal.

In his voluminous works, Shadal repeatedly takes issue with Rambam, and at times also with Ibn Ezra. Like these two luminaries, Shadal himself was, in most respects, especially in his biblical exegesis and his mode of thought, a rationalist, yet he makes it abundantly clear that of the medieval sages of Judaism his heroes are Rashi, Yehuda Halevy, and Don Yitzchak Abarbanel. All three of these taught that faith derived not from intellect alone but also from the heart and from personal belief.

Furthermore, in another aspect, Shadal was not in line with what might have been expected. The movement usually known by its German name as Wissenschaft des Judentums, in English Science of Judaism, began with the publication of the first work of Leopold Zunz in 1818, when Shadal's earliest books were being readied for print.

Shadal was a leading member of the first generation of Wissenschaft scholars. But he differed radically from the norm. Most of the other scholars of his generation eschewed the type of Jewish observance which today is called Orthodoxy. They studied traditional Judaism, but did not practise it. Shadal was the exception. In both his personal observance and in his interpretation of Jewish texts he was staunchly of the traditional school.

The Luzatto family

Shadal was born Aug. 22, 1800, in the Italian city of Trieste, which at that time was under Austrian rule. The Luzatto family was exceptionally talented, and for three centuries they produced some of the most prominent Jews of Italy. The most famous of these was Moshe Chaim Luzatto of Padua, 1707-1746, known as Ramchal, author of Sefer Mesillat Yesharim, the foremost Hebrew text on Jewish ethics, a topic which today is known in the yeshiva world as mussar.

He and Shadal were both brilliant scholars, erudite in the various aspects of Torah studies and also secular subjects. Both were prolific writers and outstanding poets, and strictly observant of Halachah. But they differed in outlook on two major issues. Ramchal was an ardent proponent of Kabbalah, whereas Shadal entirely denied its validity. And concerning certain of the teachings of Rambam, whereas Shadal took issue with them, Ramchal was fully supportive.

Shadal's father, Hezekia, a carpenter by trade, would have liked to pursue intellectual goals, but was too occupied eking out a bare livelihood. Indeed he wanted his son Samuel David to learn carpentry, but this child was so vehemently determined to study and to write that no person and no obstacle could deter him.

His mother died when he was 13. A few weeks thereafter, the young boy became seriously sick, and, following medical advice, he left school. From then on, he never attended formal classes, and his only further experience with a teacher was with a part-time private tutor in Talmud. It was by dint of his self-discipline and self-instruction that he rose to become a scholar of world renown.

In 1828, Shadal married Bilha Bathsheba Segre, daughter of one of his former teachers. But four years later she became ill, and after the next seven years of intensive care by her husband, she died. He subsequently married her sister Leah; it was a happy marriage, and she outlived him. But three of his five children died in his lifetime, at age two, seven and 24.

At age 50 he lost sight in one eye, and this hindered his ability to work. He was also hampered by the effects of the three revolutions that ravaged his part of Italy in 1830, 1848 and 1860. Each revolution entailed fighting, lawlessness, economic ruin and rapacious taxes. Shadal had to plead for the support of friends to help him survive these financial crises.

But the prolific output of Shadal's pen continued throughout his life. With each misfortune, he expressed in poignant words his intense sorrow and his acceptance of God's will, painful though it might be, and also his determination to continue his mission of writing and teaching.

Projected to prominence by imperial edicts

In 1821, the Austrian Emperor Francis I ordered the Jews of his Italian possessions to use a siddur that included a translation of the Hebrew into Italian. Shadal, though only 21, was already known for his mastery of Hebrew and Italian, and the task was entrusted to him. This siddur was quickly adopted in all parts of Italy, and Shadal's name became a household word throughout the land. At that time there were 30,000 to 35,000 Jews in Italy. For comparison, Britain had about the same number, and France, including Alsace-Lorraine, about 50,000.

Another edict by the same Austrian emperor ordered all Jews in his domains to set up training schools for rabbis wherein candidates would be taught Hebrew and secular subjects to the satisfaction of government examiners. This came in response to a Jewish petition for civil rights equal to those of the empire's Christian subjects. Jews in Austria and Bohemia immediately proclaimed the edict to be unworkable, and it was withdrawn, as was all discussion of enhanced rights.

But in Italy, the Austrian-ruled communities were quite amenable to such training for rabbis. Accordingly a seminary was established at Padua in 1829, called Collegio Rabbinico. Shadal was appointed to lead it, and retained this position for the remaining 36 years of his life. The graduates from this college filled most future rabbinical positions in Italy, including pulpits in the non-Austrian provinces, which constituted the overwhelming majority of Italian congregations.

Thus Shadal's influence had an impact on the entire land. But his writings spread well beyond the borders of Italy, and he soon became world renowned.

Two more major Orthodox rabbinical seminaries were established during the 19th century and they both followed roughly the structure and curriculum established at Padua: Jews' College in London, 1855, and, on a larger scale, the Rabbiner-Seminar (sometimes called Hildesheimer-Seminar) in Berlin, 1873.

The teachings of Shadal

What is striking about this personality is his breadth and versatility. He became an expert in each field that he entered. He was an accomplished exegete (Bible commentator), translator, philosopher, outstanding Hebraist and grammarian, a poet and an interpreter of poetry.

In all these, he researched and questioned, and often disagreed with established authority, but he never veered from the rock of Jewish faith and Jewish practice.

His criticism of Rambam involved many pronouncements in Rambam's writings.

Most important is the question of God's essence and how we are to conceive Him. Rambam repeatedly states that our approach must be through philosophy and the human intellect, and the teachings of Aristotle play an important role in this. Shadal retorts: "I esteem Rambam very greatly, but Moses never dreamed of philosophy and never heard of Aristotle."

The God described by Rambam, frequently referred to as the Prime Mover, is seemingly too remote and too theoretical to be our Father and King. Shadal recognizes that God is omnipotent and infinite, but not to the extent that humans cannot reach Him; He does have feeling, and human prayer does reach Him and move Him.

Shadal did study non-Jewish writers – classical, medieval, and modern – and he quotes them extensively. But he also states, emphatically, "My God is not the God of Immanuel Kant, but the God of the Tanach." He maintains that philosophy alone cannot lead to an improved morality, and therefore it cannot be the basis of Judaism. The emotional and historical have to factor in, as in Tanach.

To Rambam he accords abiding respect, and he frequently quotes him, his criticism of him notwithstanding. An altogether different mode applies in his references to Spinoza. Upon him he pours invective and ridicule. Spinoza's "intellectual love of God" he calls an absurdity, and he deems his impact on Judaism to be totally detrimental.

Shadal and the gentile world

The development of Reform Judaism began during Shadal's teen years, although the movement made no significant inroads into 19th-century Italian Jewry. Perhaps this is because Jews had not suffered the same deprivation of rights as in central Europe. It is well to note, though it is not widely known, that the original impetus for Reform was the desire to render Jews and Judaism more acceptable to the gentile world. Changing of religious practice was not the prime motive, but merely the intended means.

In Italy, though it is the country that first established the ghetto, Jews did not live with a ghetto mentality. By the early 19th century they were reasonably well integrated socially with their neighbours, and it may be that accordingly there was less reason for Reform.

As for the situation north of the Alps, Shadal predicted that the reform of Judaism would not succeed in producing better acceptance by the non-Jewish environment. To him, the consequence of Reform would be the weakening of Judaism, without any concomitant enhancing of Jewish rights and inter-faith relations. But as to Italy, Shadal reported that in all his years he never heard his parents make disparaging remarks about non-Jews. His family, and most other Italian Jews of this era, enjoyed cordial relations with the Christian world, on both the social and the intellectual levels. On the intellectual level, Shadal declared there is much we can learn from the works of non-Jewish scholars.

He cited halachic sources to the effect that there is a significant difference between a person who is merely not Jewish and one who is an idol-worshipper, as were many peoples of old – often called pagans. There is general agreement that Muslims are deemed monotheists, not pagans. Shadal declared that the same applied to Christians.

He took an active interest in political affairs, and enthusiastically supported Risorgimento, the movement to free Italy from foreign occupation and to unite it into one land with one central government.

Books and articles from his pen

Shadal's literary attainment is nothing short of phenomenal. He authored 40 major works and published hundreds of articles and monographs. He kept copies of the hundreds of letters he sent or received, nearly all dealing with intellectual topics.

He wrote in Hebrew, Italian, German and French, and also mastered Aramaic, Syriac and Arabic. Only a few titles can be mentioned here: translation of the Pentateuch, haftarot, and five megilot into Italian, with detailed commentary in Hebrew; similar works on several books of the Tanach; grammar of Hebrew and a grammar of Aramaic; works on the machzor and on all 800 poems of Yehuda Halevy; works on Jewish history and Jewish theology; hundreds of poems.

Shadal died on Yom Kippur, Sept. 30, 1865. His demise was the occasion for eulogies and tributes in all the leading Jewish journals of the day. The main Hebrew newspaper at the time was the weekly Hamagid. It carried eulogies on this scholar virtually every week for an entire year after his death.

The 'Ouch' in Groucho

Sunday morning is my time for reading The New York Times Book Review. Its front page featured "A Course in Marxism" – a play on the Marx Brothers whose antics had been the rage of an earlier generation. The reason for their rejuvenated prominence was a book by Stefan Kanfer, titled The Essential Groucho.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It so happens that the Marx Brothers – a name they gave to themselves at the time of World War I – were of German origin, a fairly large family that had immigrated to the United States and lived in New York City. They were vaudevillians from the very start and, in the course of time, became a fixture on the North American entertainment scene: in film, on radio, and eventually on television as well.

Groucho, whose original name was Julius Levy, was the leader and widely recognized by his painted moustache, his professional spectacles and the ashes on his everburning cigar. I suppose that I, not having been born in North America but raised in a European Jewish environment, never came to admire the nuttiness of the Brothers and, in the course of time, began to dislike Groucho. To be sure, he was funny and acerbic, displaying his wit in interviews with people who had been enticed to be his "guests" with a promise of instant prominence. As I discovered, the unfortunate part of his display was that the guests in Groucho's shows became all too often his victims. He would take advantage of the people he interviewed and induced the audience to laugh at their expense. Not only was it not funny to me, but it was also un-Jewish.

Shaming someone is a fundamental offence against human dignity, and Jewish tradition is very firm in labelling it a major offence. But is it okay when humour is involved? I think our tradition would say. "No. Laugh at yourself but not at someone who is helpless and exposed to ridicule." Jewish humour is essentially self-critical. We laugh at our own foibles and have a good time with it. It is not, to be sure, the only form of Jewish wit, but it is the most frequent and essential aspect of the way we look at life and ourselves.

Wasn't it Groucho who once said: "A club that would have me as a member is one I wouldn't want to belong to?" Neither would I, for as the shows wore on, my wife and I were inevitably put off by the way Groucho exposed the naiveness of his guests. I did not laugh at his verbal acuity but disliked it intensely and eventually ceased giving him time in my schedule.

I do not know whether Mr. Kanfer deals with the subject, but as for me, making the Book Review a vehicle for Groucho offended my sense of propriety. I felt an "ouch" when I saw Groucho so heavily promoted.

The medium and the message

Try as you may, there's no escaping politics in Israel. Even getting in your car and going for a drive inevitably brings you up against the country's intense political reality. Literally. More often than not, the car in front of you is sporting any number of topical stickers reminding you of the state of the nation.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Not for the Promised Land are bumper stickers with vulgar puns, corny jokes, commercial slogans and logos for sports teams and tourist sites like in most countries. In Israel, we like dressing up our automobiles with the issues of the day. We like to display our ideology loud and clear.

For a crash course in public sentiment, visit any large parking lot in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa in the middle of the day and look at the cars' backsides. Don't expect too many nuanced viewpoints.

Never shy about declaring political opinions verbally, many Israelis – both on the left and right – feel the need to plaster their dearest causes and concerns on their cars. It's not hard to get the message. Opinions confront your eyes with bold letters, broad strokes, emphatic exclamation points and tabloid headlines. Not just on bumpers either, but on any flat surface of the car visible to other people.

Most stickers are devoted in some way to the Arab-Israeli conflict and the peace process. The signing of the Oslo Accords in 1993 triggered a war of political bumper stickers that still rages to this day. In 1995, there was a temporary lull in right-wing messages following the assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. Almost overnight, amid charges that such stickers were part of a general climate of incitement that led to the murder, people removed what was deemed politically incorrect (read anti-Oslo, anti-Rabin, anti-Labour Party) propaganda. Within days of the funeral, a new sticker appeared, reading "Shalom Chaver," repeating the words of U.S. President Bill Clinton in his eulogy to Rabin. For months, it seemed every third car was adorned with that message.

In recent years, the most ubiquitous sticker has been one in defence of keeping the Golan Heights part of Israel. "The people are with the Golan," declares the sticker whose omnipresence has emboldened residents and supporters of the Golan in their struggle. Other favourites are: "There is a mandate for peace," backing Oslo, while "Nightmarish peace," accompanied by simulated bloody bullet holes from Palestinian terrorists, strongly denounces the peace process.

There is a commonly seen sticker for Peace Now that opposes Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip while a slew of other stickers defend them. An undivided Jerusalem, communities in the Jordan Valley and the embattled Jewish enclave in Hebron are all the object of separate stickers.

Anger over widescale Haredi draft evasion has spawned the popular "One people, one draft" sticker while arguably the one that attracts the widest consensus calls for the freedom of airman Ron Arad missing in Lebanon since 1986. Shas, Chabad and other religious movements and various star rabbis adorn many stickers no less direct in their pitch than their secular counterparts. In most cases, the slogans – on both the left and right – do not translate well into English nor into a non-Israeli context.

Election time finds sticker makers working overtime. To be sure, their products even figured prominently in this year's report by state comptroller Eliezer Goldberg on illegal financial contributions to Prime Minister Ehud Barak's election campaign in 1999. One of the things the money was used for was the printing and distribution of countless thousands of bumper stickers.

According to the report, the Barak campaign funnelled millions of shekels into illegal non-profit organizations that paid for signs, surveys and bumper stickers for their candidate.

More recently, during the Camp David talks this summer, the Likud-led opposition disseminated tens of thousands of stickers with the slogan "Peace yes, suckers no" in protest of Barak's policies.

If nothing else, the proliferation of bumper stickers provides a diversion from the insufferable traffic jams that Israelis waste more and more time in every day. Just think how many political discussions and outright arguments these stickers have triggered among people stuck in their cars on heavily congested roads.

Setting record straight

In September 1993, the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and his foreign minister, Shimon Peres, agreed to include Jerusalem in the permanent status negotiations under the Oslo process. At the time, we were told that this did not signal a change in policy and that Jerusalem would remain Israel's "eternal and undivided capital."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Seven years later, at the Camp David summit talks, Jerusalem's future was placed at the centre of the table. While no agreement was reached, the concessions that Ehud Barak seemed ready to accept regarding Jerusalem could lead to the collapse of Barak's government. Opinion polls indicate that the majority of Israelis are not prepared to endorse an agreement that would redivide Jerusalem, no matter how creatively this is done.

While much of the world has accepted at face value the 1967 half-truth regarding Israel's conquest of "Arab east Jerusalem," Israelis know better. The forgotten half of the equation is the period between 1948 and 1967, when "Jewish east Jerusalem" was occupied, ethnically cleansed and desecrated. The refusal of the Palestinians and the Arab world to acknowledge responsibility, and the fear that history will be repeated, explain why "creative" solutions are non-starters.

Jewish Jerusalem was the primary target of the Arab invasion in 1948. As the Arab Legion's commander admitted, "Only four days after our entry into Jerusalem, the Jewish Quarter had become a graveyard." The Jews that survived surrendered and were forced to leave their homes.

After the Jewish Quarter was captured, 57 synagogues, libraries and centres of religious study were ransacked and 12 were totally destroyed.

Those that remained standing were used for shelter of both people and animals. Had these been Christian or Muslim sites, the outcry in the UN and the international community would have been deafening, but the desecration of Jewish Jerusalem was ignored.

During the occupation, thousands of tombstones from the ancient cemetery on the Mount of Olives were used to pave roads and for construction of houses. Parts of the cemetery were used as parking lots and for a gas station, and the Intercontinental Hotel was built on the upper section.

The pillaging took place behind the barbed wire and walls that divided the city. From 1948 until the Arab occupation was ended in 1967, Jews were totally barred from entering the occupied Old City and the Western Wall.

Guarantees of free access were ignored, and the international community remained silent. Article VIII of the Israel-Jordan Armistice Agreement guaranteed "free access to the holy places and cultural institutions and use of the cemetery on the Mount of Olives." These guarantees proved worthless.

At the same time, the United Nations held surrealistic debates on the "internationalization of Jerusalem," and the Vatican pressed its claims, but the inaccessibility of Jewish holy sites was of no importance. As Abba Eban noted, "the Wailing Wall, the most hallowed sanctuary of Judaism and the most ancient shrine in the entire city is barred to all access by worshippers despite solemn agreements and undertakings."

This situation would no doubt have continued forever if the 1967 war had not erupted. The war was caused by a number of factors unrelated to Jerusalem, but once the Jordanians attacked, Israeli troops entered the Old City of Jerusalem. The walls that divided the city were removed, and the Jewish Quarter was suddenly reopened.

Although 33 years have gone by since then, and many synagogues and other institutions have been rebuilt, the scars of the occupation and desecration remain. There has been no accounting, no admission of responsibility and no repentance. Instead, Palestinians and their supporters have continued in their efforts to rewrite history and to erase the central link between the Jewish people and the city of Jerusalem. Indeed, every repetition of the phrase "Arab east Jerusalem" reinforces the Israeli determination to reject formulas that would turn the clock back to May 1948.

The Kirshner File

Germany confronts the pain of the Holocaust

The Federal Republic of Germany is preoccupied by the spectre of the Holocaust, which Germany's former president, Roman Herzog, has described as "one of the most horrible and shameful moments in German history."

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Two years ago, at a ceremony marking the 60th anniversary of Kristallnacht, an event which paved the way for the Holocaust, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder declared, "It is our task to fashion the present and the future so that the past cannot repeat itself."

Schroeder's comment was indicative of the fact that Germany is seriously trying to work through its angst, anguish and guilt about the Holocaust.

And yet, as polls and comments by prominent Germans suggest, its long, dark shadows have evoked something of a backlash.

Two months ago, the conservative historian Ernst Nolte sparked a national storm by implying that Adolf Hitler's anti-Semitism was animated by a "rational core." Accepting a prize from the Deutschland Foundation, which is ideologically close to the mainstream Christian Democratic party, Nolte said that Hitler may have had a rational reason for attacking Jews, since Bolshevism, a counter force to Nazism, enjoyed what he claimed was considerable Jewish support.

Since its reincarnation as a democratic state in 1949, Germany has coped with the Holocaust's terrible legacy through a variety of means.

In the aftermath of World War II, Germany submitted itself to a massive de-Nazification program, though the results were not always satisfactory.

Germany has given Holocaust survivors and Israel approximately $90 billion in restitution payments. On July 17, a special $5 billion fund was officially launched for Jews who were forced and slave labourers.

German schools offer mandatory lessons on the Third Reich and the Holocaust.

Although thousands of German war criminals have been tried and convicted since 1945, the process has not yet ended. Last year, a former Gestapo officer went on trial in Stuttgart, accused of complicity in the deaths of 17,000 Jews at the Majdanek concentration camp in Poland. Prosecutors claimed that the case could well be Germany's final Nazi war crimes proceeding. But a few months ago, a former SS officer was arrested in Munich for murdering a Jewish slave labourer in Theresienstadt. His trial is set to begin soon.

Germany has commemorated the Holocaust by building scores of monuments, small and large, and by naming government facilities after heroic Germans who paid dearly for their resistance to Nazi totalitarianism.

Last May, a military base was renamed to honour a Wehrmacht soldier who was executed for saving hundreds of Jews in the Vilna ghetto. And as visitors rarely fail to notice, Germany's landscape is dotted with Holocaust monuments and markers. At a busy intersection in Berlin, in front of a subway station, a black plaque is starkly inscribed in gold letters with the names of concentration camps to which German Jews were consigned. Some of them, ranging from Dachau to Buchenwald, have been converted into museums.

And now Germany plans to build a massive Holocaust memorial in the historic centre of Berlin, next to a far smaller site allocated for the new U.S. embassy.

In sharp juxtaposition to these manifestations of national remembrance, more than 50 percent of Germans think that a "line" should be drawn under the past, and that Germany should no longer be victimized by the Holocaust, according to surveys conducted by the American Jewish Committee.

This mood was distilled by Martin Walser – one of Germany's leading writers – in 1998 when he suggested that a "routine of accusations" against Germans had developed. In a controversial speech at the Frankfurt book fair, he acknowledged the enormity of Germany's crimes, but warned that if "the media present this past every day, I feel in myself something that begins to resist the permanent presentation of our shame." Auschwitz, he added, "is not suited to becoming a routine threat, a tool of intimidation that can be used any time, a moral stick or merely a compulsory exercise."

Sibylle Quack

Sibylle Quack, a 51-year-old political scientist from Hannover who heads the foundation in charge of building the Holocaust memorial in Berlin, said that Walser spoke for a lot of Germans of his generation. (Walser is in his early 70s.)

"There is a tendency to say, 'I don't want to hear about this [the Holocaust] anymore,'" said Quack, who has written monographs on German-Jewish life in the 1930s.

Hans Mommsen, a retired history professor whose specialty is the Third Reich, explained that the generation socialized by the Nazis do indeed wish to forget that epoch. "Yet it is important to point out that Walser's speech was not the language of the younger generation," said Mommsen, speaking at a restaurant on Lake Starnberg, southwest of Munich. "Auschwitz is an obligation, not a burden."

Hans Mommsen

In his estimation, Holocaust awareness in Germany was sharpened by the 1960 trial of Adolf Eichmann in Israel, by the 1979 Holocaust television drama, and by Steven Spielberg's 1993 Oscar-winning film, Schindler's List.

Germans have learned several lessons from the Holocaust, said Mommsen, a liberal whose great-grandfather, Theodor, was a scholar of classical antiquity and won the 1902 Nobel Prize for literature. In general, Germans reject nationalism, though not "constitutional nationalism." They have formed an attachment to democracy. They realize that the era of German hegemony in Europe has passed.

Annette Haller

Annette Haller, managing director of Europe's largest Jewish library, Germanica-Judaica in the city of Cologne, holds that Walser's comments were an expression of frustration with "enforced attitudes." Walser, she observed, was arguing on behalf of "personal memory."

Juliane Wetzel, a researcher at the Centre for Research on Anti-Semitism at the Technical University in Berlin, said that many Germans are in agreement with Walser. "They want to put this behind them," she noted, warning that Walser's attitude should not be confused with anti-Semitism.

Michael Wolffsohn, a professor of history at Munich's Armed Forces University, believes that Walser was widely misunderstood. "He never said, 'Enough is enough.' He was referring to the method of remembrance."

Wolffsohn, a Jew, dismissed as untrue allegations that Germany's intellectual elite is tired of the Holocaust. "This is fiction, not fact. German intellectuals go out of their way to do whatever they can, even imperfectly, to remember what happened. There is an essential goodwill here."

Wolffsohn may be right, judging by Germany's decision to build a central Holocaust memorial in Berlin on a 4.9 acre vacant lot. Eleven years in the making, the project combines a field of 2,700 low stone pillars in the shape of coffins with a documentation centre. It was designed by Peter Eisenman, a New York City architect. Some Germans, including Berlin's mayor, have voiced grave reservations about the "monumentality" of Eisenman's design. But its size did not deter most German parliamentarians. In June 1999, they approved the project by a margin of 314 to 209, with 14 abstentions.

Construction, scheduled to begin in the autumn of 2001, will take two to three years, said Quack. "This will be Germany's monument to the Holocaust." Or, as the Speaker of Parliament, Wolfgang Thierse, put it, "We are not building [it] solely for the Jews. We are building it for ourselves. It will help us confront a chapter of our history."

Moishe Waks, vice-president of Berlin's Jewish community, concurs with Thierse. "It's a good thing. It'll be a memorial where Germans can express responsibility for their crimes."

But two of Germany's leading Jewish communal leaders, Andreas Nahama of Berlin and Charlotte Knobloch of Munich, do not subscribe to this view. "Jews built a Holocaust memorial in 1945, and it is in their hearts," commented Nahama. "The memorial in Berlin is for the non-Jews." Knobloch was even blunter. As she put it: "It's not our problem. We have our memorials in the form of the former concentration camps."

Quack, however, is convinced that the memorial will serve a tangible purpose. "It is dedicated to the chief victims of Hitler's aggression, the people who lost the most. And it needs to be in the heart of Berlin, because the Holocaust is in the heart of Germany's history."

Philosopher's work entertains

The Consolations of Philosophy* by Alain de Botton, Pantheon, $34.50

Philosophers, new and old, are usually regarded as forbidding and difficult – reclusive, verbose, removed from the real and troublesome problems of life.

Not so, declares Alain de Botton, a young and engaging British philosopher, best known for his recent best-selling book, How Proust Can Change Your Life.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In brief essays, he highlights six forms of unhappiness: unpopularity, not having enough money, frustration, inadequacy, a broken heart and evil. He then indicates the consolation for each of these problems can be found in the suggestions and ideas of Socrates, Epicurus, Seneca, Montaigne, Schopenhauer and Nietzsche.

In a surprisingly witty, smooth, informative and chatty manner, the author offers biographical sketches of his philosophers and their approach to human psychic ills.

Seneca suggested that an animal that struggles against a noose only tightens it. "There is no yoke so tight that it will not hurt the animal less if it pulls with it than if it fights against it. The one alleviation for overwhelming evils is to endure and bow to necessity."

When the stoic Zeno received news of a shipwreck and heard that all his luggage had been sunk, he said, "Fortune bids me to be a less encumbered philosopher."

Montaigne, ensconced in his circular library on the third floor of a tower at one corner of his castle in southwestern France, wrote his candid essays – and outlined a new kind of philosophy. One acknowledged how far we were from the rational, serene creatures whom most of the ancient thinkers had taken us to be. He wrote, "Anyone who made an intelligent collection of the asinine stupidities of human wisdom would have a wondrous tale to tell…we can judge what we should think of man, of his sense and of his reason, when we find such obvious and gross errors even in these important characters who have raised human intelligence to great heights."

Schopenhauer viewed the break-up of a romantic relationship as a proper and helpful signal from nature. Evidently, the couple were not properly matched. He said that one day the disappointed lovers would come across others with whom they would achieve physical and emotional rapport.

This is because, our chin and their chin make a desirable combination from the will-to-life's point of view … we should draw consolation from the thought that a lack of love between a man and a woman is the announcement that what they might produce would only be a badly organized, unhappy being, wanting in harmony in itself. We might have been happy with our beloved, but nature was not – a greater reason to surrender our grip on love.

Nietzsche's tragic life led him to consider that the most fulfilling human projects appeared inseparable from a degree of torment. He was sure that our greatest joys lie awkwardly close to those of our greatest pains.

For the most part, what emerges is not so much consolation as wisdom – accommodation, stoicism, resignation, realism, balance and proportion. Has the author over-simplified complex philosophical ideas? Perhaps. But most readers will find much in this unpretentious work that is entertaining and even helpful.

Pharisee-Sadducee disputes

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Students can sometimes be bewildered by the nature of theological and sociological disagreements among different Jewish groups, and at times, the name calling which accompanies such debates. Yet anyone familiar even in a cursory way with the Pharisee-Sadducee disputes, the antagonism of the Karaites towards the rabbinic establishment in the medieval period and the chassidic-misnagdic controversies of two centuries ago, knows that Jews have always argued vociferously with one another; branded each other as heretics and destroyers of the faith; and, in times of sovereignty, even killed one another for various political reasons.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

An historical perspective can thus be a valuable tool in placing our present round of hostilities in the proper contexts, for history has on odd way of smoothing over and even changing how we view certain figures.

Let us take the example of the biblical figure of Pinchas, who spears Cozbi and Zimri to death upon seeing their act of public immorality. This act is roundly praised in the Torah. Now leap forward 3,000 years and imagine that a rabbi of today, upon seeing say, one of the leaders of Jewish life publicly flaunting his romantic relationship with a Gentile, goes out and kills him. Leaving aside civil law or even the Jewish statutes concerning "the zealot," what would be our reaction to this act today? Can we adapt the same paradigm?

The midrash tells us that Yehoshua married Rachav, known as the biggest harlot of the Near East. She had obviously given up that life, but again placing this in a contemporary light is quite sobering. Imagine a Torah sage of our time marrying a former prostitute. How would that play in the Jewish press or at the gossip drenched atmosphere of our Shabbat tables?

Or the initial reaction to the Ramchal, Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzato, known to many as the author of Mesillat Yesharim and Derekh HaShem. What was the Ramchal's public profile in the Europe of his time? The Ramchal, who was born in 1707 to an affluent Italian family, was suspected of being a follower of Shabbetai Zevi. The Ramchal perceived himself as a conduit of Divine illumination and indeed proclaimed that God was working through him. Although many rabbis defended him, many others characterized him and his followers as an "evil sect," the perpetrator of a false illusion.

Once this theological difference had been established, his detractors went after him in a personal way, as Elisheva Carlebach records in her seminal work, The Pursuit of Heresy. For instance, Rabbi Joseph Ergas, an 18th-century scholar, pronounces this judgment: "I am told that he is learned but that the fragrance of piety does not waft over him. I asked whether he was married, whether he went to the mikvah on erev Shabbat, whether he was careful never to trim his beard, even with scissors, and to all of these replies the answer was negative. Yet these are the pillars of spiritual attachment."

Yet presently, the Ramchal's work can be found in every yeshiva of every stripe. He is seen as the paragon of saintliness. Students should be encouraged to take the long view when confronting the myriad of positions that currently form the mosaic of Judaism. Today's villain can sometimes turn out to be tomorrow's truth.

Jewish sites for your Palm

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The hottest craze in computing today is portability and it's hard to attend a meeting or even walk down the street without seeing someone poking and prodding at their Palm Pilot. Every Palm comes with a standard datebook, address book and calculator, but that won't help you if you are trying to decide what blessing to say over apple pie, want to learn some Torah or catch up on the latest news from Israel. Today, Jewish and Israeli software for your Palm Pilot.

Some of the software below is free, others are commercial programs or shareware that you are free to try out – but if you decide to continue using them, you are expected to pay.

The best place to start your hunt for Jewish Palm software is at PilotYid [http://www.PilotYid.com/]. Ari Engel has created a marvelous site that will act as introduction for anyone who is puzzled over how to teach your Palm Hebrew. And don't miss the software collection page which has dozens of links to some of the best Jewish Palmware around [http://www.PilotYid.com/collection.html]. There are links to Jewish calendars, an exodus game, a portable version of the Shamash Kosher Restaurant database [http://www.shamash.org/kosher] and even a shofar simulator that will make your Palm stand out in the crowd. You can also join the PilotYid e-mail list to find out about new Jewish software for your Palm.

Another site worth a look is Penticon Technologies which develops software for the Palm [http://www.penticon.com/]. Their commercial programs include Hebrew Support; Luach, a Jewish calendar program; and Hebrew Graffiti in which you can write on your Palm in Hebrew. If you want to read up on this coming Shabbat's Torah reading, you can download the entire text of the parshat hashavua for free. There are also all the megillot, psalms and the Palm Siddur, which includes Minchah, Ma'ariv and Birkat Hamazon, and a must for anyone on the go, the traveller's prayer.

Some uses for the Palm can get quite creative. The folks at Torah Tidbits suggest using a freeware program called Mirror that can be downloaded from many Palm software sites [http://home.palmpilotarchives.com/utilities_2.html]. When activated, Mirror simply makes the screen go black, which makes the screen reflective. It is perfect for checking the placement of one's tfillin, especially if you use your Palm for davening anyway.

Palm Pilots aren't popular only on this side of the Atlantic. Gadget-crazy Israelis love their Palms and have banded together to create the Palm User Group Israel better known as PUGI [http://pugi.org.il/pugi/]. Their Hebrew-language Web site was created by Gil Chapnik, a medical student in Be'ersheva who threw a party for PUGI members and attracted 450 Israeli Palm lovers. Their story was documented in Ha'aretz newspaper [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2000/2000_05/20000511/67696.html].

Speaking of Ha'aretz, your Palm Pilot can also help you keep up to date with the latest events in the Middle East and the Jewish world. Two of Israel's leading newspapers offer daily Palm editions. You can download the Jerusalem Post Palm edition [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Services/PalmPost/] and the English language edition of Ha'aretz [http://www.haaretzdaily.com/htmls/22_1.asp].

Now that you have loaded all that Jewish software onto your Palm, treat your high-tech gadget with the new respect it deserves [http://www.israelwire.com/New/000526/00052628.html].

Rabbi Ephraim Zalmanovitz, spiritual leader of Israel's Mazkeret Batia community, studied the Palm Pilot and has issued a high-tech halachic ruling. According to the rabbi, someone who has "holy" software installed on a Palm, and drops it, must kiss it as one does a holy book such as a siddur.

Torah study for women

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The despair and terror described so vividly by the prophet Jeremiah in Eichah, the Book of Lamentations, have their counterpart among the Jewish people of today, asserts Rabbi Joshua Berman.

Rabbi Berman, a lecturer in Tanach (Bible) at Nishmat, and a doctoral candidate, also in Bible, at Bar-Ilan University, spoke to The CJN during the sixth Yarchei Kallah of Nishmat, an organization offering advanced Torah study for women.

The three day event was held at Or Chaim yeshiva.

Eichah was written after the Assyrian destruction of the First Temple in 423 BCE, and the exile of the Jewish people into foreign lands.

For practically the first time, Rabbi Berman said, the Jewish people had to be Jewish without a central place to worship, without even a country, and the entire leadership scattered or killed.

"It's as if now, Shabbat, kashruth and Israel were suddenly all done away with.

"They questioned what had happened to God that He could allow such a calamity. They wondered if God still existed."

Jews asked the same questions after the Holocaust, Rabbi Berman said, when their numbers had been decimated and many whole communities had been destroyed.

Rabbi Joshua Berman leads a study session at this year's Nishmat Yarchei Kallah.

Lamentations, though, is not about the destruction of the Temple. Rather, he said, it is about suffering.

Rabbi Berman said that the nature of suffering is personified by the widow, the bereaved mother, the starving child and the leader. Each sees a different aspect of what has happened.

"Jeremiah is acting like a therapist dealing with a patient who has mucked up his or her life. People in real life get angry and frustrated."

The characters are allowed to get angry at God, Rabbi Berman said, to express their pent up emotions.

One prime example, for instance, is that at the end of chapter two, the mother calls God a slaughterer.

People find a frame of reference to tragedies in their own lives, he said.

Contrary to what many think, he went on, the focus of the mourning is not the loss of the Temple.

"It is mourning the ruptured relationship with God. The Temple is the home we created with God – no home means there is no bond."

After the destruction of the Temple, the sages substituted prayer, Torah study, acts of kindness and repentance for what used to happen in the Temple.

"The system of the Temple and the sacrifices had become symbols devoid of substance. It's like an engagement ring can become meaningless. Then it is an affront (rather than a sign of love and commitment)."

Until we can return to that shared house with God, we have to boost our relationship with Him, the rabbi said.

The Yarchei Kallah, which takes place every year around Tisha b'Av, is sponsored by Canadian Friends of Nishmat, Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women, and Emunah Women of Toronto.

Israel's legal system in state of flux, says justice minister

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's legal system is in a state of flux with the government setting an ambitious agenda that will transform Israeli society in numerous ways, the country's justice minister told a legal conference last week.

Yossi Beilin, speaking at a meeting of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, said he "hopes" to introduce several key reforms in the next few years. Among them are: A written constitution; the end of administrative detention; the introduction of civil marriages; and Israel's signing onto the provisions for an International Criminal Court (ICC).

Beilin said the use of administrative detention, a holdover from the British mandate, "is a stain on our book of laws. We keep people in prison without proving anything against them and without them knowing any charges."

Although there are currently only a dozen prisoners held administratively, Beilin said, "it is one of the things we have to put an end to.

"It is inconceivable that a country like Israel doesn't sign the Rome treaty [which created the ICC]. My feeling is that if you don't sign it, you're incriminating yourself," Beilin said. He added that Israel has a better record on human rights issues than many other countries who back the court.

Israel lacks a written constitution and in its place, basic laws guide the country's courts. He said Canada's 1982 introduction of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms could serve as a model for an Israeli constitution.

Turning to the question of conversion, Beilin said "the notion that... you have to go through a rabbi if you want to be an agnostic Jew like me...is philosophically insulting. I believe we have to find [new] ways...to become members of our very interesting club," without going through a religious route.

Beilin called Israel's religiously-based matrimonial law "a major problem."

"In Israel, the question is whether we can enable a system that imposes marriages and divorce [on people] who don't want it."

He suggested there would be greater respect for religious institutions if religiously-based marriage laws were changed.

Beilin said that in the absence of a written constitution, the Israeli Supreme Court has taken upon itself the responsibility for judicial review of Knesset decisions. The high court has issued a number of decisions recently that have liberalized Israeli society.

Recently, the high court prohibited the use of "physical interrogation."

Many in Israel believe some force or the threat of force is needed against terror suspects when lives are at stake. But, Beilin suggested, "there are other ways to get information." He said the Israeli security service, the Shin Bet, is complying with the court ruling.

The Supreme Court has also prohibited parents from hitting their children. "Something that might have been right thousands of years ago is not necessarily right today," Beilin said.

In other decisions, the court upheld the adoption of a child by two women and it has permitted Reform women to pray at the Western Wall.

"The Supreme Court is ahead of the government and the Knesset" on many issues, Beilin said. But the government has initiated important legislation in its own right as part of a "comprehensive effort to change the face of Israel...to change a map that was too conservative and that didn't adapt to the 21st century,"he added.

Israel has established a commissioner to advocate on behalf of people with disabilities and to fight for access to public spaces. It is also pushing to increase Arab representation in the civil service, to codify the rights of children and is planning to create a high commissioner on human rights.

Beilin said work is under way to abolish the state of emergency that has existed in Israel since May 1948. The state of emergency has been used by the government to enact orders on routine matters that bypass normal parliamentary approval – everything from theatre prices and egg prices to the more consequential creation of the Ministry of Agriculture.

Beilin said changes to Israel's legal system will be easier to accomplish when Israel is at peace.

You've always dreamed of retiring in Israel...
Now, realizing that dream can also be in your best financial interest.

Beilin optimistic about peace

Beilin, however, deplored the very concept of settlements in the disputed territories. "The whole idea of settling the areas was wrong," he said, explaining that Israel could have demanded strategic positions in the Jordan Valley had the settlers not been a factor in the equation.

Describing the settlements in the Gaza Strip as "such a huge mistake," Beilin implied that they may be dismantled as part of a peace accord.

Beilin said that Israel has developed "a constructive dialogue" with the Palestinians, but the "sticking points" are "very problematic."

He predicted that Barak will rebuild his shattered coalition government should peace talks fail, and call an election if they succeed.

He did not rule out the possibility of an interim agreement, saying that he was personally in favour of one should a comprehensive accord elude the negotiators.

If a peace treaty is signed, Beilin said, Israel may be able to abolish its state of emergency. Enacted in 1948, the year of its birth, it was extended by the Knesset in July for another six months.

Parents launch lawsuit against Ont. government

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The parents of eight-year-old twins diagnosed with autism, are one of 21 families who are suing the Ontario government for $75 million.

Robin and Simon Wynberg are part of the group called Friends of Children with Autism. They are suing to cover the cost of being unable to work and for out-of-pocket expenses for therapy for their children. Others involved in the suit include Richard and Sheila Laredo Marcovitz and Susan and Brian Fishman.

In response to the suit, which affects the ministries of health and community and social services, the government, through the attorney general's office, argues that it is not legally or constitutionally bound to provide the services the 21 families are demanding.

The group is seeking to have a therapy known as Applied Behavioural Analysis (ABA) used with their children in school. ABA is a form of intensive one-on-one therapy based on the work of Dr. Ivar Lovaas of the University of California, Los Angeles.

Autism is a neurological disorder that generally manifests itself in early childhood as delayed development of social and communication skills.

Erla Juravsky, co-founder of the Autistic Education Centre for preschool children, which will be located in the old Dempsey House in North York, told The CJN that ABA requires 20 to 60 hours per week, depending on the child's needs. It trains other parts of the brain to take over from areas relating to attention and self-monitoring, which are affected in children with autism. It does this by teaching small units of positive behaviour and then reinforcing that behaviour.

She says she and the centre's co-founder Brenda Deskin have been using ABA with their own children and that they have recruited from the University of Toronto and York University staff who will be able to train parents of preschool children in the application of ABA. The centre intends to pattern its program after the Alpine Program in New Jersey.

"This one-on-one therapy can cost a family from $40,000 to $50,000 a year," she said.

The government has announced a $19-million allocation for certain early intervention programs for preschool children, but Juravsky said she doubted the government's initiative will be successful because the funds will be applied only to the most severe cases, children who may not be helped by other kinds of early intervention.

"I wept when I heard of the government's move because it does nothing to help us," Robin Wynberg said. "Our twins are well past the window [age]. But I'm happy for the families who will be helped."

Juravsky said the new centre will help parents with older children to some degree. While its mandate is to provide early intervention for preschool children, it will also act as a resource centre for older children.

In its statement of defence, the province says while older children with autism are eligible for a variety of programs and support, it is up to local school boards to address those needs.

School boards are unable to to meet the needs of older autistic children, said David Corbett, counsel for the 21 families, in a news release.

Wynberg said the group has stopped accepting new parents who want to be involved in the legal action against the provincial government, to prevent a further burden on the legal counsel, "and because we are paving the way for them." She said Corbett, of Eberts, Symes, Street and Corbett, is not charging for his services.

"We are at the discovery stage in the legal proceedings and we expect there will be a decision in early 2001," she said.

Wynberg said the Friends of Children with Autism has been encouraged by a recent decision of the British Columbia Supreme Court that therapies of the kind they are asking for in Ontario, are a medically necessary service. The court held that British Columbia had discriminated against autistic children.

Soviet artists remembered

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The dramatic artistry and beautiful singing of Ethel Kovenska, the grande dame of Yiddish theatre, thrilled the 250 people who attended a recent commemoration of the 48th anniversary of the execution of 24 Soviet Jewish writers and artists.

At the event held at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Kovenska was accompanied at the piano by her husband Lev Kogan, who had worked alongside many of those who were murdered.

Some audience members told the singer after her performance that they were transported from the land of their birth, Russia, by her performance.

Now a resident of Israel, Kovenska was visiting her daughter in Toronto.

Kovenska, who brings dramatic flourishes to her singing, was a stalwart of both the Yiddish and Russian theatres, and later of Habima Theatre in Israel.

She spoke with great emotion of her association with Solomon Mikhoels, Yiddish theatre director, who was murdered by the NKVD, the Russian security arm, in what she said was set up as an automobile accident.

Her singing was a fitting climax to an evening in which every facet of the contribution of Soviet writers and artists to Yiddish culture was covered.

Speaking of the murder of the 24 people in a Lubianka prison in Moscow on Aug. 12, 1952, Bernie Farber, a son of Holocaust survivors, said the purge by Stalin set off a series of events which ultimately led to the development of the Refusenik movement, and to a resurgence of Yiddish culture.

Stalin's fear of Jewish intellectuals led to the closing of the Yiddish Theatre, Yiddish newspapers and Yiddish schools, said Farber, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Actor and veteran Yiddish teacher, David Newman, read two poems by Itzik Pheffer, and brought tears to the eyes of many when he recited Mein Kaddish by the late Peretz Miransky, a Toronto Yiddish poet and writer.

Another highlight was the reading by Ellie Moidel, a Yiddish teacher at University of Toronto, of a translated version of Pheffer's I am a Jew. She also read a poem by David Hofshteyn who visited Palestine in 1923, and later wrote about how proud he was to be a Jew when he returned to Russia.

Her final contribution was to read a letter composed by a group of 80 Moscow Jews in 1970 – at the height of Soviet power – appealing to the conscience of world Jewry.

A resident of the Vilna ghetto and a well known author, Norman Shneidman, professor emeritus at University of Toronto, hailed the contribution to Yiddish culture of writers from the Pale of Settlement.

The Soviet Jews who emigrated to Israel have changed the political landscape there, said Shneidman, and the influence of Refuseniks is still to be felt in the Yiddish revival in Russia.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum brought greetings from Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Ethel Sum Cooper, chair of the committee for Yiddish, UJA FEDERATION, and members of the Kultur Gezelshaft, planned the memorial.

Harbord Collegiate grads plan to hold 50th anniversary reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Harbord Collegiate Institute holds a special place in the hearts of thousands of Jews who graduated from the high school, which was once the hub of Jewish teens in Toronto.

On Oct. 5, at Le Parc Banquet Hall, the Harbord graduating class of 1950 will be marking its 50th anniversary at a reunion party and dinner, which will bring together former graduates now living throughout North America, England and Israel.

The following morning, these alumni will be honoured at an awards assembly in the Harbord auditorium followed by a luncheon.

Murray Rubin, a member of the 1950 graduating class and a retired pharmacist, is the chair of the planning committee. He told The CJN that many graduates are excited about the reunion.

"It was Alan Borovoy, head of the Civil Liberties Association and a graduate of the 1950 class who suggested the reunion," Rubin says. "He felt that there were many in our graduating class who have never seen each other over the years."

Members of the 50th Harbord reunion planning committee are, standing from left, Henry Petroff, Esther (Brown) Moss, Mildred (Schelew) Silverstein, Hannah (Banky) Brown, Doreen (Wengle) Friedland, Peter Miller and Harold Landis. Seated are Annie (Finkelstein) Allen, Murray Rubin, chair and Lillian (Zeldin) Cooper. Missing are, Nita (Ceifets) Chusid, Ralph Shiff, Norman Latowsky, Howard Warner, Helen Klingman, Phyllis (Sandler) Platnick and Sam Brown.

For the reunion, Helen Klingman, a graduate and retired principal, compiled a historical background of Harbord Collegiate and recorded some of her recollections in an essay titled Memories of Harbord Collegiate.

She notes that from the late 1920s to the mid-1950s, 90 percent of Harbord's student population was Jewish, mainly with roots in eastern Europe.

"Many graduates of our class are prominent names in business, law, medicine, science, architecture and other disciplines."

She describes some of the unique features about Harbord, including the Harbord Club, a network of more than 2,000 alumni who provide scholarships to current students and keep members informed on the activities of graduates.

Klingman notes that along with high academic standards, Harbord boasted outstanding sports events, as well as the zany Oola Boola club, the Brotherhood of the Lost Parabola and the famous extra-curricular annual production of Gilbert and Sullivan operettas.

"The five years we were at Harbord were meaningful and memorable," says Klingman. "The students [were] very politically aware."

It was during the era of this graduating class that many families had to deal with the immediate aftermath of the Holocaust, with some survivors attending Harbord.

"This was a momentous time when Israel was declared a state. Yet with all of these intense historical events, there was also an opportunity for us to learn, to laugh, to enjoy a unique camaraderie and to make lifelong friends," says Klingman.

Rubin says he was able to locate most of the students of the 1950 graduating class, "but there are some 15 or so that we cannot find." Rubin adds that the graduation reunion is open to guests of the graduates.

If you were a member of class of 1950, you can contact Murray Rubin at 416-483-0985, fax 416-483-4693, or e-mail him at murray.rubin@sympatico.ca.

The Dr. Bernard Goldman Tribute
Thursday, October 26, 2000
Sheraton Centre Toronto

Dr. Bernard Goldman is to be honoured for his lifesaving and outstanding worldwide contributions to heart surgery and the treatment of cardiovascular disease.

As a University of Toronto professor, Bernie was asked by the Ministry of Health and the University to head a new cardiac surgery unit at Sunnybrook in 1989, which he personally supervised from ground zero and which has gained a wonderful reputation for clinical excellence and academic productivity. He was a key figure in the development of the new Schulich Heart Centre.

Surgeon-in-Chief at Sunnybrook & Women's since 1998, Bernie has devoted countless hours over many years to the education and training of students, surgical residents, and postgraduate Fellows from Ben-Gurion University, other Israeli institutions and many other countries. Last year in Jerusalem, his former trainees came together from all parts of the country to express their appreciation and present an award in his honour.

Highlights of his career include involvement in the early days of heart transplants and international leadership in cardiac pacing.

He has been at the forefront of coronary bypass surgery since its inception with emphasis on the surgical management of unstable angina. He has lectured and performed surgery in Israel, Europe, Japan, and across North America to demonstrate innovative valve reconstruction. His contributions have raised the level of cardiac treatment in Canada, Israel and other world centres.

In his support of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, Bernie continues a family tradition. His father, the late Philip Goldman, was a founder of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University and a President of the Toronto Chapter.

It is especially fitting that proceeds from the event will establish the Dr. Bernard S. Goldman Endowment Fund for Cardiovascular Research at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

As Dinner Co-Chairs, we look forward to your presence at this great event honouring an eminent Canadian.

Birthright trip in the works for physically disabled

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eli Shupak is looking for other young Jewish adults between the ages of 18 and 26 who have physical disabilities and have never been on an Israel experience trip.

He's hoping that a total of at least 19 from across Canada will identify themselves as potential participants in a Birthright Israel trip to run next February, because the Canada Israel Experience Centre, for the first time, is offering 20 Birthright spots to people with physical disabilities, and 20 spots for people to accompany them.

Shupak, a 1999 Ryerson Polytechnic University journalism graduate, has a condition known as Spinal Muscular Atrophy.

Because of his weak muscles, he uses a motorized wheelchair and the services of an attendant, on call in his apartment building, to get him out of bed and ready for the day, as well as to help him prepare meals and get him into bed at night.

To write articles on his computer, he uses a specially designed, small keyboard that doesn't require hand strength. He worked on contract at the Toronto Star earlier this year, and is interested in sports reporting or writing about disability issues.

Last year Shupak was among almost 1,200 young adults accepted to the Birthright Israel program, but when his physical needs became known, organizers realized they couldn't accommodate him, said Adam Minsky, national director, Canada Israel Experience.

"I was disappointed, obviously," said Shupak. "I've always wanted to go to Israel. I didn't know if it was possible."

He is grateful for Minsky's efforts in arranging the upcoming trip. He suspects most people would have said, "It's too bad [physically disabled people] can't go, but life goes on."

"We felt terrible," Minsky said. "We decided we'd have to come up with a program that would accommodate people with physical disabilities. Right now the challenge for us is trying to identify these people."

And he has to do that soon. "We want to know by the beginning of September whether we have a critical mass [of people]." Thus far, four potential participants in addition to Shupak have been identified. (Regular applications for Birthright Israel are due Oct. 5.)

The participants with disabilities would be integrated with other Birthright participants as much as possible, Minsky said.

Shupak recalls Minsky explaining to him that he didn't want him to be isolated if the rest of the group left to see something that was not wheelchair accessible, and that he didn't want Shupak to feel he was holding back others if they decided not to do something because he couldn't be part of it.

Minsky credits Shupak for bringing the issue of physical disabilities to the Canada Israel Experience Centre's attention. "Eli's a remarkable guy. It was fantastic that he came and approached us. It served as a wake-up call for us, realizing how much the opportunity would mean for him."

Growing up at Bloorview Children's Hospital (now part of Bloorview MacMillan Centre), Shupak had minimal social interaction with other Jews his age. The only other Jewish child he remembers was non-verbal.

Eli Shupak

He studied with a tutor for his bar mitzvah, which was held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, and has attended holiday services at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where his mother is a member. The synagogue is wheelchair accessible, but Shupak's inability to turn the pages of the prayer book while he is wearing a heavy suit jacket is still an obstacle.

A sports fan and wheelchair hockey player with about a dozen trophies, he has travelled only once in his life. Shortly before his 18th birthday, he visited San Diego and Los Angeles as a beneficiary of the Children's Wish Foundation.

On that trip, his wheelchair broke, proving how challenging travel can be for those with physical disabilities.

Whatever additional costs there may be to accommodate Birthright Israel participants with physical disabilities, "we're going to have to make sure it happens," said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada.

For further information, call Minsky at 1-800-567-4772 (1-800-567-ISRAEL) or 416-398-6931; or e-mail him at aminsky @ujafed.org.

Project Shatz launched

MONTREAL — The Council of Hazzanim of Montreal has launched a program to teach laypersons how to lead Shabbat services in a traditional manner through an instructional recording on compact disc.

It's called Project Shatz, which is short for the Hebrew "shaliach tzibur," as the person who leads a congregation in prayer is referred to.

This recording follows on the runaway success of the council's first such instructional project on leading weekday prayers two years ago. More than 3,000 CDs were distributed across Canada.

"Often people find themselves in a position where, because of their knowledge of Hebrew or musical ability, they are approached to act as the shaliach tzibur, yet they may not be familiar with the traditional chant or nusach and its appropriate melody, pronunciation and delivery," said Cantor Arie Subar, president of the council and producer of the recordings. "It is hoped that people listening to a qualified shatz will have a model to emulate and will also gain more from the service, even if they are never asked to lead."

Israeli-born Subar, who has been a cantor in Montreal for 36 years, sings the prayers on the 71-minute recording. Stephen Glass, musical director of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, was a consultant on the project.

A shatz may be called upon to lead prayers in a number of settings: in the synagogue when there is no cantor, at a shivah house where the mourner is not capable of leading the prayers himself, at a simchah, or in an area where there is no shul.

Small Jewish communities were especially interested in the first recording, Subar noted. For instance, a Halifax chaplain who serves eight communities in the Maritimes found the recording particularly useful.

Subar, who is cantor at Congregation Beth Ora, said young people are the main target of the project, but anyone may ask for a copy of the CD, free of charge. The recording has been sponsored by the Paperman family.

Project Shatz is endorsed by the Rabbinical Council of Canada, Quebec region; the Montreal Board of Rabbis, the Jewish Education Council of Montreal, and the Association of Principals of Jewish Schools.

For a copy of the Shabbat services instructional recording, write to 2510 Noel St., St. Laurent, Que. H4M 1S3, or phone 748-8838.

Israel erred on int'l court

One positive result from the meeting is the desire by some young Canadian lawyers to form local IAJLJ sections in Toronto, Montreal and other Canadian cities, he added. The organization's Web site is: www.iajljtoronto.com.

The conference addressed a broad range of topics, including human rights, democracy, commerce, crimes against humanity, electronic anti-Semitism, and the way in which Jewish and Israeli issues are portrayed in the international media. Participants also heard from Israeli Justice Minister Yossi Beilin, who discussed recent legal developments in the Jewish State.

While Beilin suggested Israel may yet sign on to the ICC, Cotler and Shestack said Israel might have influenced a different wording of the treaty had it participated in pre-agreement discussions.

They were referring to an Arab proposal that Israeli critics believe enlarged the nature of the offences covered under the treaty to specifically target the transfer of Israeli civilians into West Bank settlements.

Had Israelis "worked with the ICC process, they could change the language…[and would have] removed the extension of language that makes it look like it applies to Israel," Cotler suggested.

Shestack, former U.S. ambassador to the UN Commission of Human Rights, said the United States opposed creation of the ICC because it was concerned its peacekeepers could be charged as war criminals by the country's international opponents. Shestack, a past president of the American Bar Association (ABA), said the ABA is "strongly in favour of the United States signing" the treaty.

During a question period, Prof. Yaffa Zilbershats of Israel's Bar-Ilan University said she was concerned that by enlarging the universal jurisdiction over war crimes, "people can be prosecuted wherever they go around the world…I fear the fact that states are getting a parallel universal jurisdiction," she said.

In earlier remarks, Cotler noted that on July 7, Canada became the 14th country to ratify the ICC treaty. Sixty states must ratify the treaty before the ICC can be created. Cotler predicted the ICC might be in operation by 2002.

Summing up recent developments in international human rights law, Cotler said it has become "the new secular religion of our time."

In addition to creation of the ICC, other recent developments include the 1998 Rwanda war crimes trials; the 1998 finding that rape constitutes a war crime; the 1999 British case against former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet; and the 1999 indictment of Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic.

"More has happened in the development of international criminal law and human rights law in the last two years than in the previous 50," he said.

Despite those changes, "we are witnessing a counter-revolution in human rights, where the criminal violations of human rights have not only continued unabated, but have become the paradigmatic crimes of the 1990s," Cotler continued.

He pointed to gross human rights violations in Sierre Leone, the Congo and Chechnya as examples.

He called for "a culture of human rights as an antidote to a culture of hate" as well as efforts to "break down walls of indifference" to human rights violations.

In addition, he said the international community must adopt a "doctrine of humanitarian intervention and an end to the "culture of impunity" which leads despots to believe they will get away with their crimes.

Montreal CJA campaign to aid Ukrainian Jews

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Montreal community is being asked to help alleviate poverty among Jews in Ukraine and to encourage the youth from the area to emigrate to Israel.

The $1-million campaign, known as the Kievskaya Project, is a highlight of this year's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA).

About 105,000 Jews live in this region around Kiev, and many of them, especially the elderly or families with sick or disabled members, are living in abject conditions, CJA canvassers were told at the project's launch last week.

CJA calls them the poorest Jews in the world. According to a video that was shown, they are so poor, especially those outside the urban area, that they do not have enough to eat, their homes are slums, and they cannot afford medicine or health care.

The project's co-chair Marc Gold said that when he visited Kiev last year he was "totally unprepared for what I saw. It transformed the way I saw the world. The poorest are living in unbelievably deplorable conditions," he said.

On the other hand, however, he found reason for optimism, at least, for the youth. Many have discovered their Jewish heritage through the work of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), he said, and, with help, have a chance at a better life in Israel.

"There was this dichotomy of the despair of the older generation and the hope of the youth," he said.

Gold noted that his grandfather had come from a small village near Kiev and came to Montreal to escape anti-Semitism and improve his lot. He said he felt a sense of personal connectedness with Jews in the Ukraine today.

His co-chair, David Sela, has more immediate ties with this project. He was born in Ukraine in 1960 and his family was assisted with food packages from the Joint Distribution Committee. JAFI help them make aliyah when he was 13. The family then moved to Montreal 20 years ago.

Sela admitted that initially he thought the poverty of the people he was introduced to by JAFI on a recent visit to Kiev was "staged."

"Conditions were bad in the country I left 27 years ago, but they weren't that bad," he said.

Then he went off on his own and talked to people as a fellow Ukrainian. "I find out this is the truth."

While there is no longer official anti-Semitism, Sela said, "Everyone knows what happens to Jews in a collapsing economy."

Twenty thousand Jews from Ukraine made aliyah in 1999. A total of 350,000 Jews still live in the country.

Money raised by the Montreal community will go, first of all, for food and medical packages to be delivered to homebound seniors; to send children to Jewish summer camp; to provide meals at a soup kitchen; and to purchase equipment for the disabled, like wheelchairs and hearing and visual aids.

Larger projects include providing home care to the isolated, covering the costs of Shabbat and holiday celebrations at a synagogue, scholarships for university study in Israel, training local Jewish leadership, and opening social services or Jewish education centres in outlying areas.

Gold said the need is particularly great outside Kiev, where JAFI and the JDC are running humanitarian and educational programs.

The Montreal's involvement with Kievskaya began last year when $415,000 was raised through the Directed Plus program of CJA. This initiative allowed donors to specify how a portion of their gift, if it represented an increase over the previous year's contribution, was spent. One category was for the rescue of Jews in the former Soviet Union and their resettlement in Israel.

With that money, a Chesedmobile was bought. This van brings food, medical supplies and Jewish reading material to those in outlying areas. Gold said it cost $90,000 US to buy the vehicle and to staff and stock it for one year.

Sophie Alloul, a young Montrealer who worked as a counsellor at a Jewish summer camp in Ukraine this year, related how grateful the kids were for the opportunity to learn about Jewish history and traditions. For many it was their first exposure to Judaism.

Over 250 kids attended the camp this summer, but there may be up to 1,000 in the area who could not go because of lack of money, Gold said. It costs $360 to sponsor one child's camp stay.

Another testimonial was heard from Barbara Malov, 20, who attended the camp as a teen and was sent by JAFI to Israel to finish high school. She has since made aliyah and is studying at Ben-Gurion University.

She said JAFI changed her life. "I learned that being Jewish is not something to be teased about. That it means having a language and tradition and Jewish friends."

Avi Pazner, world chair of Keren Hayesod, attended the launch. "This is not made up, this is how our brothers and sisters live [in Ukraine]. What more noble venture could we be engaged in than saving our brothers and sisters."

He suggested that if world Jewry had been more organized, there might not have been a Holocaust.

"We may be preventing a future cultural or even physical future tragedy for these people," Pazner said.

The overall goal of the 2000 CJA, which will be kicked off Aug. 28, is a record $37 million.

Politicians, listen to the people!

Atlantic Canada has not been an especially welcoming place of late – at least for politicians. Joe Clark, has had a devilish time in his twin efforts to win the Nova Scotia byelection and return to Ottawa with some semblance of a caucus in place. Even mainstream pundits like Hugh Windsor are raising doubts about Clark's prospects of achieving either goal. Nova Scotians are frustrated and in a surly mood, as is what's left of the Tory caucus.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Speaking of surly and frustrated, just look at the Mi'kmaq of Burnt Church, N.B. Their lobster-fishing protest has given fisheries minister Herb Dhaliwal a "pincer" of a migraine. The frustration of the native fishers is outstripped only by their incredulity that the government still doesn't understand that theirs is an issue of principle, not lobster tails.

Even Stockwell Day didn't escape the wrath of the Maritime storm. In between accepting the never-ending stream of Tory defections to Canadian Alliance ranks, he spent a week trying to control the damage caused by a CA executive who dismissed Atlantic Canadians as lazy, "pogey" seekers.

Although unacceptable and dangerous as a precedent for the future, the recent pie incident involving Prime Minister Jean Chrétien reflects an almost desperate frustration of those who feel that their voices are not heard, that decision-makers have abandoned a commitment to public, participatory debate.

Clark's unwillingness to listen will cost him twofold. First, he chose to ignore advice that turfing a popular MP would only breed resentment in the riding. Second, and far more important, he refused to listen to otherwise trusted advisors who knew that his were not the qualities needed to resurrect Tory fortunes.

These are examples of a worrying trend in federal politics.

One is reluctant to turn to American politics for insight, but in his acceptance speech at the Democratic party convention, Al Gore got it right. The basic theme throughout his long address was his ability and track record of "listening to the people."

In the end, a failure to listen may simply cause people to stop talking, or at the very least, to shop around for someone who will.

נשיא חדש

למרות שאני בן להורים יוצאי פולין ומבחינה פוליטית רואה את עצמי נאמן למחנה המציאותיים- מה שנרשב בחוגים מסוימים לשמאלני, בכל זאת אני מדה באשמה: שמחתי, ואולי קצת יותר כאשר משה קצב נבחר לנשיא מדינת ישראל ושמעון פרס חזר לשורה שנייה ביציע. נכון שעל תנייר וגם על מסכי הטלויזיה ובעיקר על מסכים במדינות נכר פרס חרבה יותר מקובל ורצוי. גם בטרקלינים נוצצים של שועי עולם שמעון היה המועמד המועדף. אך מה שטוב לגויים לא תמיד טוב ליהודים, ובעיקר לישראלים. לכן בבתי הקפה של קריית גת, אופקים ובעיקר בקרית מלאכי, ניצתון קצב על יקיר האומה גרם להרבה אזרחים שסבלו מקיפוח שנים רבות להרים את הראש בגאוה ולהרגיש שגם לתושבי המעברות ועירות הפיתוח יש עתיד במדינת ישראל החדשה. ומה שטוב לישראלים חשוב יותר ממה שחשוב לגויים.

ולי אין ספק שקצב יהיה נשיא אחוד ונערץ לא פחות מקודמיו המיוחסים. ובעניין פרס: רק לפני עשר שנים זכה מידי רבין לתואר חתרן בלתי נלאה, ורבין כזכור לא היה רכלן. אז נכון שמאז צבא של יועצי תדמית הצליחו לארגן את האיש באריזה חדשה וכשרה, אך אנשים לא משתנים אחרי גיל שבעים. גם לא פרס.

Israel taking wait and see approach with Palestinians

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak said at a recent cabinet meeting that Israel is waiting to see if the Palestinians can show negotiating flexibility.

"We have yet to hear from them about the openness and willingness to discuss ideas that came up at Camp David, particularly those relating to Jerusalem," Barak said.

"In the next few weeks, we'll know whether Arafat is inclined toward an agreement or an impasse."

Israel wants peace and the Palestinians should realize that an agreement is in their interests as well, Barak added.

Turning to the stalled negotiation track with Syria, the prime minister expressed measured optimism.

Ehud Barak

"The door is still open" for talks with Damascus, Barak said, "and if the Syrians are willing to discuss issues seriously, they will be met with openness from our side."

Barak praised the work done recently by several government ministers who have explained Israel's Camp David positions to various world leaders.

The warm reception given to these Israeli ministers, Barak said, contrasts "with the response that Arafat has met in his travels, which demonstrates the international community's dislike for unilateral actions."

Barak added that the UN Assembly meetings next month will be an opportunity for Israel to reap the dividends of the diplomatic efforts ministers have made in recent weeks.

Jerusalem is indivisible, Katsav tells Germans

By AMICHAI ALPEROVICH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BONN — President Moshe Katsav has firmly rejected any possibility of dividing Jerusalem or granting authority in the city to Palestinians or to any international body.

In an interview with the German newspaper Bild, Katsav said: "Jerusalem has been the capital of the Jewish people for three thousand years. The city must remain as such without being divided. Jerusalem is holy to Christianity and to Islam, but these religions also have holy places that are outside the State of Israel. The places that are holy to us, the Jews, are located only within Israel."

The president added: "When the Old City of Jerusalem was under Arab rule, Jews were not allowed to visit the holy places such as the Western Wall. Only since all of Jerusalem came under Israeli rule in 1967 have the members of all religions been given access to the holy sites. We will continue to guarantee freedom of religion in Jerusalem."

Moshe Katsav

With regard to the peace process, Katsav said: "I truly believe that we will reach a peace agreement with the Palestinians. There is no alternative to peace other than war and violence."

Katsav also expressed his opinion about the burgeoning radical right in Germany. "There is a duty to fight with all one's strength against the trend of resurgent neo-Nazism. We Israelis must also learn from the past. Israel must be a safe haven for Jews from throughout the world."

More Jewish families moving into Muslim quarter

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapert Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Two Jewish families will soon move into the Beit Varsa site in the Muslim quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem.

The enclave has been renovated over the past year to enable it to accommodate three additional Jewish families. Two families have already been living at the site.

A fifth Jewish family is expected to settle at Beit Varsa in another two months bringing the total number of Jewish families settled in this part of the Muslim quarter to 15. All told, close to 60 Jewish families live in the quarter today, and if a number of yeshivot and other religious facilities and Jewish-owned stores are counted, about 1,000 Jews live, study and work in the Muslim quarter.

1,000 Jews live, study and work in the area

Most Jewish families and Torah institutions in the Muslim quarter are located on Hagai Street, which runs between the Damascus Gate and the Western Wall. For months, exploratory excavation work has been done in the quarter's Beit Hatzelem area, close to Herod's Gate, as preparation for a construction project, which the haredi Ateret Kohanim group wants to sponsor.

This project, which is now under preparation and has yet to be submitted to the Jerusalem municipality's planning authorities, would create housing for another 20 Jewish families.

In recent weeks, the Jerusalem municipality has authorized the construction of an additional floor at Beit Gavriel, a Jewish structure in the Old City's Christian quarter. When the new floor is built, four new Jewish families will settle at Beit Gavriel.

The municipality also recently gave the green light for expansion work at Beit Hatzelem, to accommodate more Jewish residents in this Muslim quarter enclave.

Speaking for Ateret Kohanim, Mati Dan told Ha'aretz that Israeli proposals to put the Muslim quarter under some form of Palestinian sovereignty has stirred consternation among various Jewish groups. These proposals, he said, will be resisted, not only by Jewish residents of the Old City, but by the vast majority of Jews who recall that this Old City quarter once had a mixed Jewish-Arab population, with thousands of Jews living in it up to, and after the 1929 riots.

Speaking against Palestinian sovereignty, Dan asked rhetorically: "Have they murdered, and also inherited?"

Hamas leader says PA foiled 175 terrorist attacks

By JOSEPH ALGAZY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Gaza-based leader of Hamas, Sheikh Ahmad Yassin, claims the Palestinian Authority foiled 175 terrorist attacks on Israeli targets last year. This disclosure came in an extended interview with Yassin published recently in the Christian weekly A-Sinara.

Yassin said Hamas guerrillas remain active and are prepared to strike against Israel. But they haven't carried out terror attacks as a consequence of security co-operation between the PA, Israel and the United States.

The recent lull in Hamas activity shouldn't be mistaken for an indication that the Islamic resistance group is in retreat, Yassin warned. Events will soon prove that the Taibeh-based cell, which was involved in a shootout with security officials in early March 2000, was not the last Hamas military group, he claimed.

Yassin charged that the Palestinian Authority, in collaboration with Israel, keeps Hamas activity under surveillance. PA security agents quickly dispatch Hamas secrets to Israeli counterparts.

"Every word which I utter to my wife, in my own home, gets to them [the PA, and Israel] on the very same day," he said.

Yassin said 1,000 Hamas men are incarcerated in Israeli prisons and another 300 are confined in PA jails.

He warned that if Yasser Arafat compromises with Israel on Jerusalem "it will be political suicide on his part." Hamas cannot condone any agreement with Israel, since it doesn't recognize its existence, he added.

Yassin praised Palestinians who dwell in Israel and have helped Hamas operatives carry out terrorist strikes. He called on "all Palestinians to take part in the bitter, long struggle" of militant resistance against Israel.

Jewish settlers could become hostages, PA official warns

By AMIRA HASS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A senior Palestinian official has warned that if Israel blockades the West Bank and Gaza following any unilateral declaration of independence, Jewish settlers there will be treated as hostages.

Ahmad Abdel Rahman, general secretary of the PA cabinet, said that if an agreement is not reached between Israel and the PA, "we will begin implementing our sovereignty and the conflict will reach a new level."

He added that "the Israelis who are present on Palestinian territory will become hostages. Israeli settlements will be isolated and will face a real threat. If the Palestinians are placed under siege, they will have the right to do everything in their power to remove it."

'Conflict will reach a new level'

In recent days, there has been an escalation in the war of words between Israeli and Palestinian officials.

Palestinian officials have been emphasizing that a negotiated settlement and declaration of a state are not "something to be haggled over like in the market."

Abdel Rahman expressed doubts about Prime Minister Ehud Barak's intentions in the negotiations.

He added that Israel and the United States are busy giving the impression to the world that Palestinian efforts internationally have failed, when, he claims, Palestinian positions were received with understanding and support from world leaders.

Suspect held over '92 and '94 Buenos Aires bombings

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

WASHINGTON — A Pakistani citizen arrested in California for visa violations is suspected of having been involved in the attack against the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires in 1992 and the bombing of the Jewish Community Centre there in 1994.

The man, Muhammad Abas Malik, was arrested last week and is being held by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) in San Pedro.

The head of Argentina's intelligence agency said Malik is wanted for questioning in relation to the investigation into the two bomb attacks. The total number killed in the two attacks was 115.

Argentina's Supreme Court prosecutor is now expected to fly to the United States to question Malik. The Argentinian intelligence chief said information on Malik arrived through Interpol.

The American authorities agreed to hold Malik in custody for further interrogation. Argentinian authorities said that if necessary they will ask the United States to extradite Malik.

Auschwitz disco stirs outrage

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An international Jewish human rights group has expressed outrage at plans approved by the local authorities in Oswiecim – the location of the Auschwitz Nazi death camp – to build a disco in a building used by the Nazis as a workhouse for slave-labour prisoners of Auschwitz.

"It is difficult to put into words the level of rage felt by the victims of the Nazis and world Jewry at both the owners of the discotheque and a political establishment in Poland that would validate the mocking of the victims of Auschwitz," said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, the associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

The site of the proposed disco is roughly two kilometres from the former death camp, but adjacent to an international centre for young people visiting and learning about Auschwitz, the Holocaust and the Nazi genocide.

Oswiecim Mayor Adam Bilski was quoted by Polish media as saying there is no legal basis to deny a permit as the site is not within a protective zone around the camp.

American Jews nervous Lieberman will bring out closet anti-Semites

By BRIAN SEIDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Al Gore and Joe Lieberman after their nominations.

NEW YORK — Nervousness is tempering the initial euphoria over the selection of a Jew on the Democratic ticket for the White House.

"Here comes this event, and we're unable to celebrate unencumbered by anxiety," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

While he said the anxiety has not reached "panic proportion," the "buzz" reaching the ADL is that many Jews are worried about a rise in anti-Semitism after Senator Joseph Lieberman, an Orthodox Jew, was chosen as Al Gore's running mate.

Foxman said he was surprised at how insecure many in the Jewish community appeared. He said he had expected to see more confidence in the American people's acceptance of Jews.

"Anti-Semitism is there. It hasn't disappeared," Foxman said, but stressed that the rate of anti-Semitism is "the lowest it's ever been."

A 1998 ADL survey found that the number of Americans who held strong anti-Semitic views had dropped to 12 percent from 20 percent in 1992 – and from 29 percent in 1964.

But despite lower levels of anti-Semitism, hate groups focused their vitriol on the Connecticut senator during the past week. Before the advent of the Internet, many of these people would have been content to write anonymous letters to the editor of their local newspaper or confine their comments to like-minded people meeting in basements and bar rooms. Now, they have an international audience.

"The idea of Orthodox Hebe Lieberman being a heartbeat away from the presidency makes me want to retch," wrote one contributor to the Internet message board of Stormfront, a white supremacist group.

"We already have a Zionist-occupied government, but now the Clinton-Gore administration has brought it out of the closet," wrote another.

Lieberman, addressing the issue of anti-Semitism, told CNN talk show host Larry King last week, "I'm sure there are some anti-Semites out there. But you know, this people, the American people, are so tolerant, they're so open, I'm just convinced that they're going to vote for me or against me not based on my religion, but based on how they judge me as a person and whether they think I can do this job, and I can't ask any more than that."

Foxman said he believes the American people will not let anti-Semitism affect the presidential campaign.

"We will respond when it's serious, but I believe America has come of age. At the end of the day, Joe Lieberman will be judged as an individual and not by the fact that he goes to shul or doesn't go to shul," Foxman said.

But in online message boards, the issue of how Lieberman practises his Judaism is argued even among Jews.

One contributor to the America Online Jewish Community message board wrote, "Had Lieberman been a Reform Jew I would say, great, the job is yours. However, as an Orthodox Jew he is absolutely not supposed to do various things that are going to crop up in his vice presidency.

"If he makes concessions, he is no longer Orthodox."

Some criticized what they see as hypocrisy on Lieberman's part, maintaining the importance of religion in his life, but attending meetings and other activities on Saturdays.

Lieberman has addressed that issue by saying that for the past 12 years in public life he has voted on Saturday as part of the Jewish tradition of pikuach nefesh, or saving people's lives.

The senator recently clarified his interpretation of that tradition to mean he may work on Shabbat, but only to promote "the respect and protection of human life and well-being."

Israel's first ambassador to Egypt dies at 68

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's first ambassador to Egypt is remembered as a diplomat who helped cement the 1979 peace treaty between the two countries.

Obituary

Eliahu Ben-Elissar, who was most recently Israel's ambassador to France, died of a heart attack at the age of 68.

Praising Ben-Elissar's many years of service to the Jewish state and his role in post-peace relations wth Egypt, Prime Minister Ehud Barak said the ambassador "poured content into the new peace between the two states."

Ben-Elissar served for 10 years in the Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence agency, before embarking on a career in politics.

Former prime minister Menachem Begin appointed Ben-Elissar director general of the Prime Minister's Office in 1977 after he joined the Likud party.

Later elected as a Likud legislator, Ben-Elissar served for two terms as the hawkish chair of the Knesset's powerful foreign affairs and defence committees.

Likud colleague Uzi Landau described Ben-Elissar as a "bitter opponent" of the Oslo accords.

Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu appointed Ben-Elissar ambassador to the United States in 1996 and to France in 1998.

Ben-Elissar's death came just after he and several other diplomats had been recalled by Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Ben-Elissar died as he was preparing to return home, the Foreign Ministry said.

Israeli girlfriend claims missing U.S. soldier is a spy

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli police are searching for a U.S. military officer who is missing from his base in Texas and is believed to be in the Jewish state.

A woman claiming to be the girlfriend of Jeremiah Mattysse said the lieutenant-colonel had spied for Israel. Mattysse reportedly is a convert to Judaism.

Israeli sources said Mattysse's disappearance – he did not return from a scheduled leave on Aug. 7 – was more likely related to a romantic entanglement.

In media interviews, the woman, Rivka Nir, said Mattysse, 50, sent bags of classified documents to her home. He had access to these documents while serving as head of an intelligence unit at Camp Bullis in San Antonio.

Nir, 48, said Mattysse removed the documents and deposited them in safe deposit boxes around the country.

Mattysse had been in Israel since the beginning of August – moving around disguised with a beard and wig and sleeping in a tent, Nir said.

She said he told her he wanted to seek political asylum in Syria, because "Israel will betray him, as well as other Arab countries that have relations with the U.S. and receive weapons from it."

Mattysse was reassigned with a U.S. Army Reserve group in San Antonio after an investigation was launched into a possible extramarital affair.

His disappearance is of "heightened concern" because of his intelligence background, a speaker for the U.S. Army Reserve Command was quoted as saying.

The San Antonio Express-News reported that Mattysse's wife, Vanda, filed for divorce March 7. An attorney for Vanda Mattysse reported that a divorce is pending.

Nir, who also has American citizenship, likened Mattysse's situation to that of Jonathan Pollard, a former U.S. naval intelligence analyst serving a life sentence for spying for Israel.

In an interview with Israel Radio, Nir said Mattysse only wanted to help Israel, and when he came to her, they "raised a cup" in honour of Israel.

But security officials dismissed suggestions of a serious security breach, and members of Nir's family said most of her claims were "fantasy" with perhaps a "grain of truth."

Israel's deputy defence minister, Ephraim Sneh, dismissed a suggestion that Israel might try to exchange Mattysse for Pollard.

"I don't think anyone is dealing with that at the moment," Sneh told Israel Army Radio.

U.S. officials formally asked for Israel's help in locating the errant officer in a meeting last Friday with Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who immediately agreed. The military attaché to the U.S. Embassy interviewed Nir over the weekend as part of the effort to locate Mattysse.

The incident was splashed across all of Israel's papers, and Yediot Achronot dedicated seven pages to the story.

It's never too late for refreshing strawberries

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

For me strawberry season begins at Passover and continues until I can't find them anymore at the end of the summer. I thought I might share some berry information.

Farm fresh, just picked strawberries will, of course, be the freshest and the most delicious. If you're lucky enough to have a picking farm within easy travelling distance it's an adventure I can highly recommend for the entire family. When picking strawberries, try to pick early in the morning or later in the day when the fruit is cool. Strawberries taste best when eaten within two to three days of picking. You should cover and store them unwashed in the refrigerator. Do not crowd or press them into a container. They need to breathe. Look for plump, bright red and fully ripe berries. The caps should be attached green and fresh looking. The size of the strawberry is not important. All strawberries, large and small, are equally sweet and juicy.

Almost all berries are sold by weight or volume. Container sizes vary from farm to farm: pints, quarts or larger. A pint box of medium sized berries will generally hold two cups. Two cups of berries, crushed will yield about one cup of purée.

There are several ways to store fresh strawberries. Sort and remove any bruised or damaged berries as soon as possible and use them in sauces, purées or jams. Place the berries in cool, well ventilated containers (32 to 40 degrees). The moisture content of fresh strawberries is high, so store uncovered or loosely covered. Hull strawberries and rinse gently just before serving.

STRAWBERRY CREAM PIE

1 9-inch baked piecrust
1 recipe cream filling (see below)
½ cup almonds, slivered, toasted

Filling
3 tbsp. cornstarch
½ tsp. salt
½ cup sugar
3 tbsp. flour
2 cups milk
1 egg, slightly beaten
½ cup whipping cream, whipped
1 tsp. vanilla

Strawberry Glaze
½ cup fresh strawberries
½ cup water
2 tsp. cornstarch
¼ cup sugar

For cream filling:

In a saucepan combine the cornstarch, salt, sugar and flour. Gradually stir in the milk. After combining the ingredients place the mixture over a medium heat, stirring constantly, and bring to a boil; reduce heat and cook and stir till thick. Stir a little (2 to 3 tbsp.) of hot mixture into egg; return the egg mixture to remaining hot mixture.

Bring just to boiling, stirring constantly. Cool, then chill. When cool, beat cream filling well then fold in the whipped cream and vanilla.

For Pie:

Toast almonds until lightly browned, then sprinkle over the bottom of the cooled piecrust. Fill crust with chilled cream filling. Halve 2 cups of the strawberries. Pile atop filling.

For Glaze:

In a saucepan crush ½ cup berries; add the water; cook for 2 minutes; sieve and return liquid to the pan. In a cup mix the sugar and cornstarch together, gradually adding the mixture to the berry juice.

Cook, and stir till thick and clear. Cool slightly; pour over halved strawberries. Keep refrigerated till serving time. Serves 6.

STRAWBERRY ALMOND MUFFINS

½ cup butter, softened
¾ cup sugar
2 eggs
½ cup milk
1½ tsp. almond extract
1½ cups all-purpose flour
½ cup whole wheat flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
2 cups strawberries, chopped
¾ cup slivered almonds

Preheat the oven to 375 and line a 12-cup muffin tin with paper liners. In a bowl of an electric mixer or food processor, cream the butter and sugar. Add the eggs, one at a time, and blend until fluffy. Mix in the milk and the almond extract. In a separate bowl, sift the flours, baking powder, and salt.

Add the flour mixture to the milk mixture and blend until just combined. Fold in the strawberries and almonds. Fill the muffin cups to the top and bake for 30 minutes, or until golden brown. Makes 12 muffins.

Your child can master math

Does your child have math trouble? Or is he or she so gifted, the standard curriculum is too easy? Or is your young student doing OK, but eager to excel? If you answered yes to any of these questions, call Math Masters. Math Masters offers 1-on-1 tutoring for all levels, primary to OAC. Teaching is linked to the curriculum, and aims at getting far enough ahead to let the slower student keep up, yet give the child who learns faster the needed challenge.

No computers or calculators here. For most purposes, a well-taught mind can match a calculator; and the brain's batteries don't run down. Math Masters students learn basic math along with general study skills, and progress from there, growing more able and more confident.

Every tutor has at least a bachelor's degree in mathematics, and is tested for ability to communicate and get along with students. Your tutor will pay personal attention to your child's strengths and weaknesses.

You may hire a tutor for as long as you want; and hours are flexible, including week nights and weekends. For details call: (416) 223-6284.

Israeli youth choir to perform at Royal York in Toronto

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — The Sheba Choir began with six shy Ethiopian children.

Now, the choir, an ensemble of Ethiopian-Israeli youths, will perform in Canada for its first time later this month.

The choir was formed just over 10 years ago, and has since become an institution in the Israeli music scene. It has also made its mark in Jewish communities around the globe.

"Being invited to perform overseas is very exciting for the children," Dalya Meidan, manager of the choir, told The CJN. "They are extremely polished performers and enjoy themselves most when the audience is warm and receptive."

The choir is made up of Ethiopians aged 12 to 17. Their repertoire consists of Ethiopian folksongs with an Israeli twang.

The kids perform often in Israel – having recently taken part in the annual Israel Festival in Jerusalem in May. Going overseas is usually reserved for school holidays, so as not to interfere with the choir members' school educations.

Meidan said the tours are set up so that the children can easily make up missed schoolwork. The city of Netanya (where a majority of the kids live), has even set up tutors to help the kids with missed schoolwork.

The group began in the late 1980s when Israel Television was producing a special program about Ethiopian Jews. One of the producers asked musician/composer Shlomo Gronich if he would help out. So, Gronich came to the studio and met 40 children. After persuading them to sing for a bit, he chose six of them.

Gronich sang together with them for the TV program.

These six became the seed of the Sheba Choir. Gronich and the group continued to meet after the program. He wrote new songs, and slowly their repertoire grew.

The choir's first songs included The Journey and The Stork Song, which were composed by Gronich. Poet Chaim Idissis set the lyrics.

It was an awkward task for Gronich, despite his having written music for theater, ballet, pop, and rock because he did not know much about Ethiopian music. At that time he sent the children home with tape recorders and asked them to bring back examples.

The kids, as well as their sold-out audiences, think Gronich has done a good job. The Stork Song, tells the story of large flocks of storks which migrate every year over Jerusalem and then pass over Ethiopia.

Tradition has it that Jewish children in Ethiopia would sing a song to the storks: "Oh stork, oh stork, how is our city of Jerusalem?"

The song mixes Amharic with Hebrew. While the second song, The Journey is not related to traditional Ethiopian music, it has become the most popular song of their repertoire, and has been adopted as an unofficial hymn by the Ethiopian community.

It tells the story of the Jewish exodus from Ethiopia, about their trek over the deserts of Sudan, and the hardships and fears they faced during Operation Moses. The children involved in the choir feel they are contributing to the Ethiopian immigrant community in Israel.

The Sheba Choir

Meidan hopes that this desire to play a role in the community remains.

"In five years, the youngest children today will be the oldest children in the choir. Today, almost all of the choir children were born in Ethiopia. In five years we will probably have a majority of children who are sabras," Meidan said. "We sincerely hope and desire that there will be as much interest in this unique community then as there has been until now, and that the sabra children will feel pride in their heritage and will want to showcase their community for the world."

The choir will perform on Aug. 28 in Montreal at The Medley, 1170 Rue St. Denis, 514-345-2600; in Toronto for the UJA FEDERATION's Campaign 2001 community launch on Aug. 30 at the Royal York, 416-631-5700. Both shows are at 8 p.m.

SCHOLAR STUDIES TROVE OF IMMIGRANT ESSAYS

Jocelyn Cohen, a doctoral student at the University of Minnesota, is studying a trove of 1942-era essays she found in the archives of the YIVO Institute, in which hundreds of Jewish immigrants explained why they came to America.

YIVO, formerly known as the Jewish Scientific Institute, had sponsored an autobiography contest to encourage the public to record important details of their life experiences for future generations. They received some 233 responses, mostly written in Yiddish.

Many of the essayists intrinsically understood the historical value of their experiences, appreciated the opportunity to put them into words and lauded the organization for its foresight in attempting to preserve the historical record.

One woman, however, wrote to the institute that she doubted anyone would seriously listen to her. "I am a symbol of my people," she wrote. "All the tragedies of my people are reflected in me. I have tried all my years to speak to you. You don't want to hear me."

Max Weinreich, the organization's research director, responded, in part: "If many Jews tell us their life-stories, then we'll understand the sources of their sorrows, and we might find a better remedy for them. We would want the same from you. We will certainly believe you. We might learn important things for others from your life.

"We suggest therefore that you should indeed write your life story. Write everything which troubles your heart, and describe your entire life from childhood to this day; write as if you were writing to a friend."

Cohen reports about her find in a recent issue of Jewish Culture News, the newsletter of the New York-based National Foundation for Jewish Culture (NFJC). She indicates that similar essay contests had also produced results in the 1920s and 1930s. The NFJC's Web site is located at www.jewishculture.org.

Neil Simon play at Leah Posluns Theatre

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Neil Simon's plays are as successful in Budapest as they are in North America, says Zed Pitkin.

"I think it may have something to do with the universal spirit of Jewish humour," said Pitkin.

Pitkin, 42, will direct Neil Simon's play Laughter on the 23rd Floor, at the Leah Poslun's Theatre on Sept. 2.

He has teamed up with Lance Brass, 21, who will produce the play.

Brass, who was a student at Forest Hill Collegiate, said this will be the first time the play will be presented in Canada.

"I can't understand why Laughter on the 23rd Floor has never been done in Canada," said Brass. "It's incredible, full of laughs, a typical Neil Simon play."

It ran on Broadway in 1993 to good reviews, with Nathan Lane in the lead, he said.

A total of 600 actors auditioned for the nine parts – seven men and two women, said Brass.

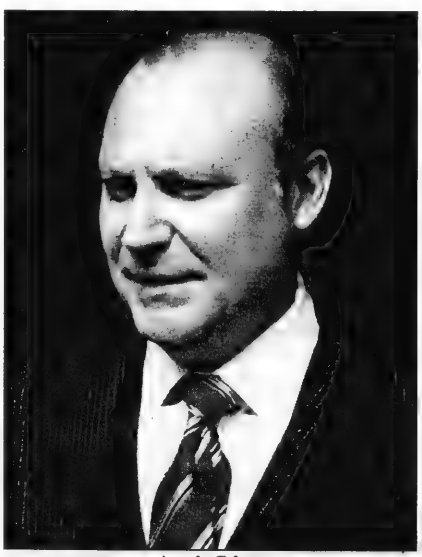
"I had the first auditions in my office but later we had to use the Tarragon Theatre. It's unbelievable the amount of talent we have in Toronto."

The cast, all Canadians, includes Angelo Celeste in the lead role of Max Prince, and actor Lou Israel. Celeste is also in Atom Egoyan's new short film, The Line, to be shown at the upcoming Toronto International Film Festival.

Pitkin directed Neil Simon's The Odd Couple and The Sunshine Boys in Hungary. He was attracted to Laughter on the 23rd Floor by the beauty of its language and its comic lines.

Pitkin's grandfather perished in the Holocaust, along with several other family members. His parents, Joseph and Helen, still reside in Dunajska Streda in Hungary.

Both Brass and Pitkin have produced or directed plays in Toronto, Brass at St. Michael's Theatre and Pitkin at Ryerson's Studio Theatre.



Angelo Celeste

Brass said he selected the Leah Posluns theatre because he thinks it is a beautiful space. He is also planning to produce The Sunshine Boys there in December.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Most people who know Bathurst Street experience it by driving, a local photographer points out.

The conglomeration of postwar strip malls interspersed with apartment buildings, nondescript shops, many with second floor living quarters, and cars pulling in and out of parking areas makes the corridor from Eglinton Avenue to Sheppard Avenue look like a throw-together mistake.

But through the lens of his talented eye and his camera lens, Toronto photographer, teacher and curator Viv Ingelevics has created a series of photographs that, as individual scenes, are pleasant and colourful images of the street.

His stop-action photos depict scenes that most of us rarely view or explore.

Combined, the photos, exhibits and audio track create an evolving historical view of the street.

In conjunction with Ingelevics' works and the historical documentation of the Bathurst area, several exhibitions by youngsters are on display until Oct. 31.

An exhibition of Ingelevics' documentary through colour photographs, titled Bathurst Street, is on view in The Koffler Gallery, Koffler Centre of the Arts, 4588 Bathurst St., until Sept. 3.

Ingelevics, who grew up in the Bathurst-Eglinton area, says he became interested in Bathurst Street in his childhood, when many of the buildings were new.

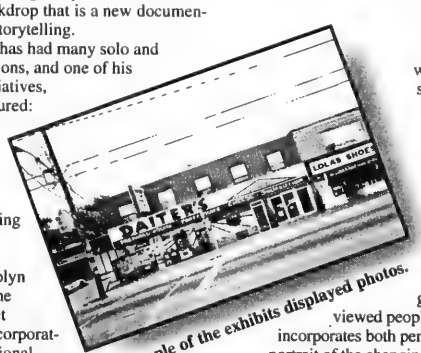
The 27 strip malls and buildings of this postwar modernist era, Ingelevics says, tell the story of the migratory waves and form a historical backdrop that is a new documentary form of storytelling.

Ingelevics has had many solo and group exhibitions, and one of his curatorial initiatives, Camera Obscured: Photographic Documentation and the Public Museum, is presently touring Canada.

Curated by Koffler's Carolyn Bell Farrell, the Bathurst Street exhibit has incorporated some additional artistic elements to complement Ingelevics' photos.

There are a series of black and white graphic street rubbings and stampings of manholes and street markings created by six of Ingelevics' students and former students at the Ontario College of Art and Design.

And in an ongoing oral history gathered by the artist, we hear the voices of a number of individuals who speak of their recollections and experiences in the Bathurst area.



An example of the exhibits displayed photos.

They are also at the Koffler Gallery, with some pieces on view in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre lobby.

Grade 11 students at Sir Sandford Fleming Academy, under the guidance of teacher Jessie Gordon, photographed Bathurst Street and worked with their images to create patterns, panoramas and whimsical impressions of this culturally diverse area.

Another display, Photographic Montage, was created by grades 5 and 6 students at Temple Sinai Religious School. Teacher Susan Schwarz, who documented shopkeepers and their businesses in the area 30 years ago, took her students to the same businesses. The students photographed and interviewed people, and the project incorporates both periods, presenting a portrait of the changing face of Bathurst Street.

There is also a display of creative miniatures by the BJCC Summer Centre Camp art project. Under the guidance of instructor Valentina Andrei, children ages eight to 12 designed and built the models, which are also on view at The Koffler Gallery.

Gallery hours are Sunday to Friday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Admission is free.

Gallery tours and hands-on workshops are available. For more information, call 416-636-1880, ext. 268.

COMPANY SPECIALIZES IN BAR AND BAT MITZVAH TOURS FROM CANADA TO ISRAEL

Network Tours is a Toronto-based travel wholesaler specializing in bar and bat mitzvah tours to Israel, which its managing director, Gary Unsworth, describes as "a niche or specialty market that is very big – it's a sleeping giant."

According to Unsworth, an average of 1,000 families in Ontario and Quebec book bar and bat mitzvah tours to Israel each year. Some years the number may be as high as 1,400 families, he says. His definition of a family? A group of four, 10 or even 15 related people. Indisputably, that adds up to considerable traffic.

"Last week alone, 27 families called for information," he reports. "The tours are very popular."

Network Tours' 15-day itinerary includes hotels, meals, extensive touring (with a desert safari and camel rides and other adventures for young people), entrance fees, entertainments and, of course, a religious ceremony at Masada (unless a family opts for a service at the Western Wall, or another location instead).

Network Tours funnels the bar- and bat-mitzvah trade into select time periods, allowing families to benefit from large-group discounts. "By combining dates, the families can take advantage of lower rates," says Unsworth. "It reduces the price considerably."

The company's price sheet shows how reductions increase as group size gets larger. For example, a family of four (two adults and two children in two rooms) pay $8,769 US when travelling with a party of 15, $8,279 in a party of 30, and $7,869 in a party of 40.

The prices do not include air fare, but Network Tours claims it can get special fares from El Al. The itinerary dates are: Dec. 24, 2000 to Jan. 7, 2001; Mar. 11 to 25, 2001; July 1 to 15, 2001; July 29 to Aug. 12, 2001, and Dec. 23, 2001 to Jan. 6, 2002.

The tours can be booked through any travel agent in Canada, and Unsworth stands ready to advise any families needing assistance. Call him at 416-789-4350 if you have questions about planning a bar or bat mitzvah celebration in Israel. (Collect calls accepted.)

Detailed tour brochures are available through travel agencies.

Israel Notes

• Video cameras at the Gamla Nature Reserve allow visitors to eavesdrop on the nests of Griffon vultures on the Golan Heights. The birds, which have a three-metre-wide wing span, nest on cliff ledges. The site of an ancient Jewish revolt against the Romans, Gamla boasts the ruins of what is believed to be the world's oldest synagogue.

• Visitors seeking an e-mail connection in Israel may visit any of the country's many cyber-cafes. Rates are as low as $3 an hour or as high as $15; some places charge by the quarter-hour. Many hotels feature computer kiosks in the reception area where, for a fee, guests may log on, surf the Web, and send and receive e-mail.

• Last year some 50,500 Canadian tourists visited Israel, a figure the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) claims is a new record. "There's no doubt the papal journey encouraged Canadians to share the Israel experience," says IGTO director Arie Shevi-Shibi, who is hoping that 60,000 Canadians will visit Israel during this year. New carbon monoxide poisoning treatment launched

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A simple mechanical device assembled from components available in a scuba diving store has proven highly effective against carbon monoxide poisoning.

All it took was the imagination and talent of Toronto Hospital anesthesiologist Dr. Joseph Fisher and his youthful assistants at a tiny lab in the Toronto Hospital General Division.

Carbon monoxide is an odourless colourless gas, which, when inhaled, combines with the hemoglobin in the red blood cells to prevent the delivery of oxygen to the body.

In the early stages of carbon monoxide poisoning, the only symptoms may be headache, nausea and fatigue. If the carbon monoxide is not eliminated from the body, coma and death can occur.

Even if the patient survives, there may be serious neurological and psychological symptoms. If a woman is pregnant, the effect to the fetus may be catastrophic.

The only treatment now is to give 100 percent oxygen, either in a hyperbaric chamber, of which there are only three in Ontario, or by mask. The idea, Fisher told The CJN, is to salvage as much as possible of the brain, heart and other vital organs before they are irreparably harmed by oxygen starvation.

Fisher's technique evolved from his research into the way in which the brain controls the diameter of the human breathing tubes.

Dr. Joseph Fisher

Looking for clinical applications, Fisher decided to use the research to try to find a way of treating carbon monoxide poisoning that would be more effective than the oxygen mask.

Fisher's apparatus is a simple valve that provides a mixture of oxygen and carbon dioxide to the body. The mixture "works with the physiology of the body to eliminate carbon monoxide up to three times faster than oxygen alone," he said.

Because it is portable, compact, small and inexpensive, Fisher said, it can be used right at the scene of a poisoning incident, by paramedics, ambulance personnel or firemen. "People don't have to wait for transport – they can be treated right away, so more tissue can be salvaged."

The technology, which is currently being developed for commercial use, has other applications too, such as the resuscitation of newborns, treatment of stroke patients and alleviation of fetal distress.

Fisher has gathered around him a cadre of young university students, who work with him in his research. One student, Josh Rucker, won first prize for presenting Fisher's invention at the convention of the Society for Academic Emergency Medicine in San Francisco.

Fisher said he became interested in treating carbon monoxide poisoning when his own parents were victims, after fumes from a car that had been left running in the garage entered their house.

He knows the grim statistics: Carbon monoxide poisoning is the commonest cause of death in the world, he said, responsible for between 40,000 and 70,000 emergency room visits a year. That is not counting symptoms that are not recognized as being carbon monoxide related.

It is an even bigger problem in the Far East, he said. "In Korea, for instance, it is usually warm. People deal with an occasional cold snap by burning fossil fuels indoors – creating carbon monoxide."

Fisher is looking forward to the time when his device is in universal use. In the meantime, he has one piece of advice: use carbon monoxide detectors.

Don't test drivers by age: CARP

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Drivers should be monitored by their driving and health records rather than their age, says the president of the Canadian Association of Retired Persons (CARP).

The Ontario government's program, which requires drivers over 80 to be tested on their road knowledge and vision every two years, smacks of "ageism and sexism," Lillian Morgenthau said.

But John Hastings, Ontario deputy minister of transport, defended his department's policy for drivers 80 and over and said the government does not intend to change it.

Under the program, no road test is required, as it was every year prior to 1996.

Hastings said CARP's recommendation that the ministry should restrict licences for drivers who have medical concerns or have been charged with driving offences, regardless of age, "is worth exploring."

The restrictions, CARP has suggested, would prohibit driving on highways or after dark.

The CARP recommendation was endorsed by Evelyn Shulman and Anne Schlifer, co-chairs of the Jewish Association of Seniors.

"It's a little frightening to see people on the road who should not be driving," said Shulman. "But I'm 80 and a fairly good driver. My daughter says I drive with authority."

Though she is not 80, Schlifer said she voluntarily gave up her licence for six months because of retinopathy (an eye problem) until the condition was corrected.

"It is stupid to test people because they are 80," she said. "What about the younger drivers who cause accidents? Anyone with physical or mental problems that affect their driving should not have licences," she said.

Hastings said the Ontario government's program testing seniors every two years is "working well" as can be seen in the literature, which, he said, indicates that since 1996, there has been no increase in the number of accidents caused by drivers over 80.

In addition to the road knowledge and vision tests, those over 80 must take part in a discussion with a counsellor and other drivers. The counsellor can ask for a road test as a result of the discussion or if a medical report raises any problems, Hastings said.

Also all drivers in their 70s who are convicted under the Highway Traffic Act must, by law, take a road test.

The government's driver program for seniors is the most stringent in Canada, he said, adding that doctors are taking "very seriously" their responsibility to advise the ministry if they believe someone should lose a licence.

Young horses give trainer hope for the future

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

FORT ERIE, Ont. — The Sam Son Farm of the late Ernie Samuel may be among the most prominent in Canadian horse racing today, but the Fishman racing family has been involved in the sport a lot longer.

Stan Fishman, now training a stable at Fort Erie, pointed out that "my father, Morris, was riding races in Cuba at the age of 14; he lied about his age. He was quite a talented man, a Golden Gloves boxing champion who turned to training after his days as a jockey.

"In 1947, he trained Canada's Teddy to win the Canadian Championship, now known as the Rothmans."

Stan's brother Donald won the Dr. Fowler Award in 1958 as an outstanding student at the Guelph Veterinary School and is one of the top veterinary surgeons in Canada, as well as a breeder of thoroughbreds.

Fishman follows in father's footsteps

"I was a riding counsellor at Jewish Camp New Moon as a teen," Stan Fishman remembered, "and my wife Merle [Cabesky] was a counsellor there too. I always was a part-owner of a horse or two while dad was training, but I wound up managing the Paddock Tavern on Bathurst until 1984.

"I missed the horses and being outdoors, and then I took up training. I think the best horse I trained was Kid Sherkin, who lost by a nose after a thrilling stretch run to Derby Wish, who won over $1 million [US]. I had him nominated for the Louisiana Derby but he got sick and was never the same.

"The next-best horse was Patermagant, who I claimed for $20,000 in June, and in October won the $100,000 Wonder Where Stakes by five lengths – only to be disqualified!

"From such a high to such a low in such a hurry," Fishman said.

Patermagant was bred by Fishman's brother Donald.

Stan Fishman is training at Fort Erie for the first time in many years.

"We have a couple of nice two-year-olds and it's easier to get stall space at Fort Erie," he explained. "Also, the track surface is kinder and the surroundings are more relaxing. There are good restaurants for when my wife visits on weekends, and the country air is better for the horses, for me and for my ace groom, Kent Smith."

A third generation of Fishmans has also entered racing, but as owners and not as "hands-on" horse lovers.

The Fishmans have high hopes for a two-year-old colt, A Stroke of Luck, who has the nickname "Fuji" because he has the same white star marking on his forehead as Fusaichi Pegasus, the Kentucky Derby winner recently syndicated as a breeding stallion for some $70 million.

"I gave him the nickname before Fu-Peg won the Derby," Fishman pointed out.

The other two-year-old prospect is Roast Beef; Dr. Donald Fishman picked both at an Ocala, Fla., auction. Fuji is owned by Stan Fishman's son Elliott, a stock broker, and partners who include Darrin Cudmore.

The older horses in the Fishman stable include No Execution, owned by Dave Tomlin and Tony George; Canada's Coleman (named for the late, great sports writer), owned by Uri and Erik Fishman (Donald's sons) and partners; Bittersweet Symphony, owned by Harold Swartz; and Jack Stork, owned by Barbara and Stanley Mourin.

With race purses being increased greatly because of income from the slot machines at Woodbine and Fort Erie, "horse racing is now an up-and-coming business. It's the best time to make a profit racing since I can remember," Fishman said.

What keeps Fishman coming to the track before 6 a.m. every morning?

"When you have young horses, you have hope," he answers. "Fuji and Roast Beef are beautiful horses, with good conformation and good breeding. They could turn out to be superstars."

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

Double jeopardy

Some years ago, after a bar mitzvah, I was approached by an elderly woman. She proudly pronounced to me that she hadn't belonged to a synagogue in over 45 years.

It didn't take much prompting for her to reveal her story. In the 1930s, as a young woman, she lived in downtown Toronto, near Kensington Market.

Her husband, who was very active in a small shul he helped establish, suddenly died, leaving her alone with two small children.

Unaware of the workings of synagogues, during the High Holy Days she appeared at the small shul, and went to her customary seat, with her two small children in tow.

No sooner had she sat down, when the shammas (one of those involved in the daily running of the synagogue) began to berate her in a harsh voice heard by all: "Who do you think you are? You think you're someone special? You think you can just walk in here and take a seat, without a ticket? No one without a ticket is allowed to be here!"

The woman was too startled to respond. Overwhelmed with embarrassment over her failure to obtain tickets in advance, but even more by the public humiliation she was subjected to, the widow bundled up her children and frantically raced herself and them out of the small shul.

"And since that time I never returned," she continued. "Even when the president called me to apologize for what happened, I could not forgive. It was like all the work my late husband had done for the shul never happened.

"When that man yelled at me, I felt as if they were burying my husband for a second time.

"And," she continued, "you know what?

"I wouldn't even let my children attend Hebrew school, or allow my son to have a bar mitzvah. I knew that was wrong, I knew I was denying them something they should be having, only because of what had happened to me. Still, I was too upset to even consider ever again involving myself or my family with the organized Jewish community."

The above story is about the misuse of power, about how a few words spoken in anger by someone in a position of authority can have far reaching and devastating consequences.

But the story is also about how victims sometimes compound their suffering, by never being able to release themselves from the pain of their wounds.

The thoughtless man who publicly insulted the woman probably forgot about the incident a week after it transpired, if he even dwelled upon it at all. But his victim was still haunted by the incident 45 years later, and recalled it, with all the pain and hurt feelings, as though it had happened to her yesterday.

If we cannot forgive others for their misdeeds (and, indeed, sometimes there are those who do not deserve our forgiveness), then we must at least bring ourselves to a place of healing. Otherwise, we suffer twice: during the original injury and forever after, as we endlessly dwell upon the injustice we so unfairly received at the hands of another.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My cousin, with whom I am very close, is about to make a huge mistake and there doesn't seem to be anything I can do about it.

Sherri, who is 29, has recently purchased a home on her own. You would think a person with the brains to save enough to buy a home at that age would have some smarts wouldn't you?

This home needs work. She is about to hire a guy to do all kinds of renovations without a written contract. He is very charming and has promised her the world, however without anything in writing she'll be lucky to get a fraction of what he promised.

I'm a lot older than Sherri and have been around the block a few times. I am trying to get her to learn from what I've been through, but she is determined to prove she can do it all on her own. How can I let her go through with this?

Experience Counts

Dear Experience Counts,

Ever heard the saying "You can lead a horse to water but you can't make him drink?" You are doing your best to be a good friend to Sherri by "leading" her though your experiences and mistakes. However most people need to learn life by creating and solving their own problems.

As a cousin and close friend, it is very hard for you to sit idly by, when you feel in your heart that this guy is a rip-off artist who is about to make your friend his next masterpiece.

Maybe you can at least talk to her about withholding a percentage of his payment until the job is done, but without a written contract they would probably end up battling it out in the courts.

It is very hard to stand by and watch someone close to you do something that you know in your heart is wrong, but you can only tell her about your own experiences and hope that some of what you say will sink in. Be there for her no matter what she decides and, if necessary, to pick up the pieces when it's all over. Maybe this guy will surprise us both and live up to his word?

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

King Abdullah speaks in Tel Aviv

Jordan's King Abdullah visited Tel Aviv last week in an effort to boost the peace process. He took time out from his meeting with Prime Minister Ehud Barak to lay a wreath in Kikar Rabin. Khatami meets Iran's Jews

Promises 'Islamic mercy'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Iranian President Mohammed Khatami met Iranian-Jewish community leaders last Thursday in a bid to ease the anxieties of his country's Jewish minority after the conviction of 10 Jews last month for spying for Israel.

Khatami met with a group of 40 Jews, including the wife of one of the convicted men, and promised to defend their rights, said Iranian Jewish lawmaker Morris Motamed.

"It was the first time that a 40-member Jewish group was meeting an Iranian president. We discussed the situation of Jews in Iran and the president said he was obliged under the constitution to defend the rights of all Iranians, including Jews," Motamed said.

Iran's constitution recognizes the rights of Jews, Christians and Zoroastrians and assigns them a total of five seats in the country's 90-member parliament. Motamed, who holds a seat representing the Jewish community, said the group also discussed the case of the Jews jailed on espionage charges.

Appeal ruling expected by Sept. 5

"The president said the case had nothing to do with religion and that the suspects were both Jews and Muslims. He said he hoped that Islamic mercy will be considered after the appeal has been finalized," Motamed said.

The country's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei has the right to grant pardons after the appeals process is exhausted.

The trial – and televised confessions by two of the defendants – alarmed the Jewish community, who felt the spotlight put the whole group under suspicion.

Iranian Jews, the largest such community in the Middle East outside Israel, have lived in relative tranquillity for more than 2,000 years. The Jewish community numbered about 100,000 just before the country's 1979 Islamic revolution. Now there are about 25,000 Jews.

Motamed will travel with parliamentary speaker Mahdi Karrubi to New York next week to attend an inter-parliamentary meeting. He said he would remain to accompany Khatami to the annual UN General Assembly meeting in September.

Hossein Ali Amiri, the judiciary chief of southern Fars province where the men were tried, said the appeals court would issue its judgment by Sept. 5.

Poverty among Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Poverty among Jewish Canadians is as prevalent as it is in the general population, according to a new study.

One in six – or about 17 percent of all Jews in Canada – is poor, mirroring the ratio among all Canadians, finds the study by Carleton University professor Allan Moscovitch.

The study, its author says, should go some way toward exploding the stereotype that all Jews are rich, as well the belief among many Jews themselves that their co-religionists are all well off.

Carleton University professor's study

"What the study shows is that for Canadian Jews, poverty is as relevant as in mainstream society," said Moscovitch, a professor and former dean of social work at Carleton. Admitting the existence of poor Jews "is something we've shied away from. The myth of Jewish wealth has been widely accepted in the Jewish community," he told The CJN.

For many people, he writes, the finding may be "surprising," because "it does not accord with the widely held view outside and inside Jewish communities across Canada that the entire Jewish population is well off financially."

WINNIPEG — Several dozen people gathered at the Hebrew Sick Benefit Association Cemetery here recently to bury 40 tombstones that had been smashed beyond repair. Traditional Jewish prayers for the dead were recited by Rabbi Alan Green. Some 300 headstones were smashed a year ago in what was described as the worst incident of vandalism at a Jewish cemetery ever in North America.

Zbar Promoted

TORONTO — Morris Zbar, formerly assistant deputy minister at the provincial ministry of correctional services, has been promoted to deputy minister of correctional services. Zbar is a former vice-president of planning at UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto.

Moscovitz Honoured

OTTAWA — Hadassah-WIZO of Canada will honour Jason Moscovitz, chief political correspondent for CBC's The National, with a scholarship in his name at Carleton University's school of journalism. The event will take place at the group's national launch Sept. 7 in the Senate's Aboriginal Room. Also that day, Ottawa's acting mayor will declare September Hadassah-WIZO Month.

ISRAEL

Picture Published

JERUSALEM — New satellite pictures of Israel's nuclear reactor were published on the front page of the daily Yediot Achronot last week. Israel has never admitted manufacturing nuclear weapons at the reactor site in the southern Negev, but the pictures, taken from the Federation of American Scientists' Web site, clearly show the weapons facility.

Gas Discovered

JERUSALEM — A natural gas reservoir has been discovered off the southern Israeli coast. The reservoir near Ashdod is believed to contain quantities capable of supplying Israel's natural gas needs for some 20 years.

Olympics Conflict

JERUSALEM — Israel's sports ministry is considering whether to allow Israeli athletes to participate in competitions that would fall on Rosh Hashanah at the summer Olympic Games in Sydney, which begin in mid-September. Two of the finals are reportedly in competitions where Israeli athletes have a chance of winning a medal.

WORLD

Canadians at JTS

NEW YORK — Aubrey Glazer of Toronto has graduated as a rabbi from the Jewish Theological Seminary here. He plans to return to the University of Toronto's Centre for the Study of Religion to pursue a doctorate. As well, Harold Wolfe of Toronto has been named to the board of overseers at JTS.

Truman's Letter

WASHINGTON — Wartime President Harry Truman wrote two letters in July 1945 backing German reparations for Jewish Holocaust survivors. But the letters were never sent to the State Department, according to the Reuters news agency.

Dr. Laura Uninvited

NEW YORK — A controversial Jewish radio personality was uninvited from an international conference on Jewish medical ethics. Laura Schlessinger, known as "Dr. Laura," was reportedly removed from the program, scheduled for February 2001, because of her earlier remarks that homosexuality is a "biological error" and deviant behaviour.

Suspect Arrested

NEW YORK — The United States arrested a Pakistani national who could be linked to the still-unsolved bombings at two Jewish sites in Argentina in the 1990s. U.S. sources confirmed they arrested Mohammad Abbas Malik for being in the United States illegally. Meantime, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, on a visit to Buenos Aires, pledged to increase U.S. assistance in the investigation of the bombings of the Israeli Embassy and the Jewish community centre in the Argentine capital.

Citizenship Stripped

NEW YORK — A U.S. appeals court has unanimously affirmed a 1999 lower court decision stripping an admitted SS concentration camp guard of his U.S. citizenship. Romanian-born Michael Negele, 80, most recently of St. Peters, Mo., served at Sachsenhausen in Germany and at Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia. He entered the U.S. in 1950 using a visa obtained by concealing his Nazi past.

Swindler Said Alive

LOS ANGELES — A man convicted of swindling Holocaust survivors may be alive after faking his death in 1993, according to the Los Angeles Times. Lucian Ludwig Kozminski, himself an Auschwitz survivor, may have defrauded as many as 3,000 survivors and their heirs out of reparations money.

Rabbi Presides At Gay Marriage Ceremony

VANCOUVER — This city's Jewish community is abuzz with the news that a local rabbi officiated at a lesbian marriage ceremony.

Rabbi David Mivasair, spiritual leader of Or Shalom Synagogue, presided over the Aug. 13 nuptials between two Jewish women, Rahel Bailie and Emma Hamer. A few days earlier, the women's application for a marriage licence had been rejected by the provincial vital statistics office, but the couple wanted a religious service nonetheless.

Rabbi Mivasair conducted the service, beneath a chuppah, at a rented hall.

At Or Shalom, the synagogue's group e-mail was buzzing with discussion over whether a rabbi should have conducted the service.

But Rabbi Mivasair defended himself in an article in the synagogue's bulletin, Keren Or, saying that in his interview for the position five years ago, he explicitly stated that he would be open to blessing same-sex marriages.

He also explained that his decision to preside over the ceremony was a personal one and did not reflect his synagogue's policy.

Rabbi Yitzchak Wineberg of Chabad Lubavitch said Rabbi Mivasair's actions were "a tragedy," and that he "will have to answer to his maker."

Peterborough Jewish community comes to life

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

PETERBOROUGH — The Beth Israel Synagogue will be rededicated on Sept. 24, in celebration of the rejuvenated Jewish life here.

It cost $250,000 to renovate the synagogue, three times what the original Beth Israel cost to build in 1964, said community elder Isidore Black, 85, son of Philip Black. Philip was the first rabbi of Peterborough, and one of its pioneers.

Feature

"We have more Jews living here than ever before, but the number of active families is smaller than before, a situation which I believe is not unlike what is happening in other communities our size," said Isidore, who retired from operating a clothing store in 1989.

"We have scientists, doctors, lawyers, professors, you name it, but not all are active Jews. We have only about 10 families who are active in the synagogue, but there may be as many as 100 Jewish families here."

If anything, the community is stronger and more united than ever, having survived a possible fragmentation and sale of the synagogue, said resident Margo Gillman, an active member.

"Perhaps other communities can benefit from what we did," she said.

The synagogue has a mailing list of 40 families and keeps in touch with another 20 families in neighbouring communities.

Women are being called up to the bimah for the first time, said Gillman, whose son, Stephen, is one of five Peterborough teenagers who have just returned from an outreach program in Israel.

Black is impressed by the energy and commitment the new, younger members are displaying and gives a lot of credit to Dr. Mark Siegal and Ron Molnar, co-presidents of Beth Israel.

Indeed, it has come a long way from the time the late Rabbi Abraham Fine and his wife used to heat the community's mikvah with hot water from a coal stove. Rabbi Fine was the combined rabbi, Hebrew teacher and shochet.

Isidore and Belle Black. His grandfather, David Florence, was one of the community's first Jewish settlers.

The late Louis Sukloff, the first Jew to be bar mitzvahed here in 1911, rode his bicycle from house to house collecting 50 cents from each family to pay Rabbi Fine $35 a week.

But with a growing family, Rabbi Fine could not make ends meet and went into business for himself.

Now, the community will celebrate its rededication with more bar and bat mitzvahs in the year ahead than it has ever had, under the guidance of Hebrew teacher and co-ordinator Paula Baruch Houpt, a mother of four children, whose oldest child is one of her students.

Among the volunteers who help out with the teaching are former students who pass the Judaic torch along.

History at every turn

The stories of past Jewish life are as plentiful in the rich, verdant valleys of northern Italy as the countless outcroppings of towns and villages from the luscious, leafy green hillsides that crest gently upward toward the Alpine mountains.

Two Canadians recently went on a visit to the area in search of some of those stories. They found a multitude.

From the editor's desk

The Jewish presence in Italy predates the destruction of the Temple. In the first century of the common era, there was a significant Jewish population, estimated by historian Solomon Grayzel to have been around 100,000, mostly living in the south, centred around Rome and Sicily.

Grayzel records: "When the Palestinian academies revived under the Mohammedans, in the seventh and eighth centuries, the south Italian Jews benefited therefrom and for a while led in Jewish learning in Europe. Naturally the Jews of north Italy were the first to take advantage of the learning of their neighbours, and invited scholars to come and settle among them. Several important books in Jewish literature were written by Italian Jews around the year 1000... From the [north Italian] city of Lucca came the learned Calonymos."

In fact, learned Jews came from all across and to northern Italy. By the beginning of the Renaissance, Jews were already contributing in significant scholarly, artistic and financial ways to the flowering of the arts and sciences in places such as Florence, Venice, Milan, Pisa, Bologna, Mantua and Padua, setting a new course in European history that would introduce the first great light in the intellectual and material advancement of humanity after the Dark Ages.

Evidence of past Jewish involvement in the history of northern Italy can be found with virtually every turn in the road. Often, it is no further away than a glance upward at a wall or a mural.

In Cividate Camuno, a town of about 2,600 in pretty, far northern Valle Camonica, a fresco was recently discovered in a room attached to a main "downtown" building. In the fresco, what appears to be two Passover scenes are depicted – a seder and a seder preparation.

Rafi D'Angeli

In Bienno, a town near Cividate,but slightly larger – about 3,500 – the wall behind the main council table in the council chamber of the City Hall boasts a large mural painting of the story of Purim that features Esther (Hester), Mordechai (Mardocheus) and Achashverosh (Asverus Rex).

In Soncino, one can see and touch the original printing press on which the first ever Hebrew-language Bible was printed in the late 15th century, even in the very same building in which it was originally housed.

The city of Padua holds special interest for anyone familiar with the inspiring works and writings of the members of the famous Luzzatto family. (Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits wrote last week in The CJN about Samuel David Luzzatto; coincidentally Elliott Malamet wrote about Moshe Chaim Luzzatto – the Ramchal – in the same issue.)

The first Jews appear to have arrived there in the 12th century. The Ramchal was born there in 1707.

The university in Padua, among the first great institutes of higher learning in Europe, attracted a great many scholars and thus ensured that the city would become a centre of both secular and rabbinic study.

There were once three synagogues in Padua: the Italian synagogue built in 1525; the German one built in the same year and the Sephardi synagogue built in 1617. Today, only the Italian synagogue remains, even though it was damaged during the war. The other two were destroyed during the war years.

In its Jewish heyday some 300 years ago, nearly 1,000 Jews probably lived in Padua. Today, there are approximately 170.

Rafi D'Angeli is the chief secretary of the Jewish community of Padua. Born in Israel, he came to Padua about 30 years ago. From an office in the same building as the synagogue and nearly adjacent to the restored, modest, though starkly beautiful sanctuary, he bravely and resolutely administers the business of the small community.

But it is a difficult task.

The future is uncertain for this once storied Jewish community. There are too few Jews to sustain a Jewish school, although a handful of children are enrolled in Talmud Torah studies on Sunday afternoon.

Alas, Jewish life in Padua appears now more archival than animated.

Wiesenthal Centre names director of development

Avi Benlolo

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After seven years as a campaign associate and director of young leadership at the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, Avi Benlolo is transferring his fund-raising and leadership development skills to the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Benlolo, 29, was recently appointed the centre's national director of development for Canada. Leo Adler remains as director of national affairs.

Benlolo will be responsible for major gifts, special events, leadership development and office operations, as well as representing the centre in Canada.

Although the centre has operated in Canada for more than 20 years, "it needs to be put on the Canadian Jewish charitable map," Benlolo said. "It needs more marketing, and a strategic plan must be put into place."

Part of Benlolo's plan of attack is to highlight the centre's activities, both domestically and abroad.

The centre is involved in a number of worthwhile international ventures that Canadians will likely support, he suggested. One, a Museum of Tolerance, is planned for Jerusalem. Another is the centre's efforts in Asia to educate local businesses about the inappropriateness of using Nazi symbols to market consumer products.

On the domestic scene, Benlolo aims to develop both "high level" and "grassroots" supporters for the centre. He pitches "the need to ensure the vitality of the future of Canadian and international citizens" and opposing anti-Semitism wherever it rears its head.

The centre is participating in several programs and events designed to increase its public profile. On Sept. 27, along with several other Jewish organizations, it will sponsor a national ceremony in Ottawa to honour Canadian survivors of the Holocaust.

On Nov. 13, the centre will present the Toronto gala premiere of Seeds of Peace, a film that combines historical narration with stories about Israeli early days. The event will be chaired by Gerry Schwartz of Onex Corporation. On June 4, 2001, the centre will present a concert event featuring the works of composers who perished in the Holocaust.

Benlolo attended Tel Aviv University, the University of Toronto and York University. He completed a master of arts degree in sociology and his master's thesis focused on resistance in Nazi concentration camps.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is dedicated to preserving the memory of the Holocaust, opposing modern hatemongers, fostering tolerance and promoting educational outreach. Its main office is in Los Angeles, where it boasts a roster of glamorous supporters from the entertainment industry. It maintains offices in L.A., Toronto, New York, Florida, Jerusalem, Paris and Buenos Aires. Benlolo said that while the centre's Canadian operations have been centred in Toronto, he hopes to expand its supporter base to other Canadian cities, perhaps eventually opening offices outside Toronto.

Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital honours Anisman

TORONTO — The Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital recently held their first dinner draw honouring longtime community volunteer David Anisman.

David Anisman and Noreen Azoulay.

David Brown, national president of Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, made a special presentation to Anisman on behalf of the international and Canadian Friends and praised the project chair saying that for the past 30 years he has led by example.

"He gives willingly and generously to many causes. He has raised his family and inspired his friends through his actions," said Brown. "David does not only give generously, but convinces others to give as well. Through his efforts he helps his friends perform one of the most important mitzvot. That of giving tzedakah."

Brown also announced that a plaque has been erected in the hospital's lobby, acknowledging Anisman's support.

Chaim Fachler, Laniado Hospital's international fund-raising director, announced the government of Israel would be matching all funds raised at the Toronto event in order to speed up the expansion of Laniado, the only hospital serving over 250,000 residents in the Netanya area.

Brown also gave an honourable mention to Noreen Azoulay, executive director of Canadian Friends, stating that she and Anisman were a powerful team, having worked together for the past eight years on various fund-raising efforts for Israeli causes.

Toronto councillor Michael Feldman served as master of ceremonies.

Steve Ain marks 30 years as a Jewish community professional

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over the past three decades, Steve Ain has seen "huge changes" in the federation world, both in terms of the magnitude of operations and the roles assumed by major donors.

"To give you an idea of the extent of the growth, in spring 1967, before the Six Day War, the Toronto UJA campaign raised $2 million," Ain said recently in his office at UIA Federations Canada, where he has served as a part-time consultant since his June retirement as the organization's executive vice-president.

"The kind of money that comes through the Toronto federation [now] – between the UJA annual campaign, supplementary giving and Jewish Toronto Tomorrow – you're talking about a $50 to $60 million-a-year business."

Another significant change, he noted, is that 30 years ago the largest donors were also the community decision-makers.

"Today these types of people are still stepping forward in terms of their financial contribution, but most of them don't either have the time or inclination to lead the governance of the community. There are very few who make key decisions. Now it's people who are extremely knowledgeable about community affairs, but who don't necessarily have influence within the philanthropic leadership."

Steve Ain

In addition to his consulting role at UIA Federations, Ain is serving as a part-time consultant to United Jewish Communities (UJC) – the New York-based organization resulting from last year's merger of United Jewish Appeal, the Council of Jewish Federations and United Israel Appeal of America – where he works with large-city federations.

His two consulting roles, which occupy about 3½ days per week, were preceded by a stint as interim chief operating officer of UJC when he juggled his New York duties with those he held as executive vice-president of UIA Federations.

Ain began his career in Jewish communal service as a youth worker with what was then known as central region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) in Toronto. At age 22, he was fresh out of the University of Toronto's school of social work. The "only person in the place under age 50," he had "longish hair" and was a guitar player who was "seriously into" folk music.

Helped organize demonstrations against Soviet premier in '71

At one point he was chastised for appearing on television in shirtsleeves with his tie undone, when he was involved in organizing demonstrations against then Soviet premier Alexei Kosygin, who was visiting here in 1971.

Ain returned to his hometown of Montreal in 1974 to become CJC's assistant national director. He returned here in 1978 to open the Canadian office of the Council of Jewish Federations, then joined Toronto Jewish Congress (now UJA FEDERATION) in 1980, first as budget director, then campaign director of United Jewish Appeal, and as executive director of the Toronto Federation in 1985.

In 1992, he became executive vice-president of United Israel Appeal of Canada, which merged with the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada in 1998 to become UIA Federations Canada.

Ain's late father Joe, who was in the construction business, was a federation president and campaign chair in Montreal, and his mother, Fay, has been involved with Canadian Women's ORT. They met at a Young People's Socialist Wing meeting.

Ain, also, was politically inclined, although his priorities have shifted, he indicated. When he worked with students, dealing with "ferocious" anti-Israel rhetoric on campus, Ain didn't want to spend his time "organizing dances or movie nights so we should show The Graduate," he recalled.

"Today I feel very differently. I would support anything that would bring Jewish boys and girls together, because in a way, the issue of intermarriage and continuity has superseded a political crisis in Israel."

Israeli soldier makes surprise visit to parents

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a surprise Goldie and David Dacks will not forget.

At 7 a.m. on a recent Monday, their son Michael, who they thought was in Israel doing army duty, appeared at their door.

"My first thought was that he got kicked out of the army," Goldie said.

Michael, however, was part of an Israeli radio program about Jewish communities around the world.

The program – produced by Galei Tzahal, the Israeli army radio station, and the Jewish Agency – chose two soldiers – the other one was from Moscow – whose parents were not living in Israel, to go home and surprise them.

"They recorded our reaction at the door, and I honestly cannot remember what I said; it was all so amazing," Goldie said.

They also recorded Michael's trip to Camp Shalom and Camp Ramah, where he talked to campers and counselors about Israel, what they feel their connections are to the country, and how Judaism and Zionism play a role at camp.

Michael, 24, a graduate of the University of Western Ontario, first visited Israel three years ago, and did his last year of university at Hebrew University.

Michael Dacks in Israel

"I loved the country, and learned the language quickly. I decided I just wasn't ready to go on to law school although I had won a scholarship to the law school at Western," Michael said.

He made aliyah in December 1999, and after a two-day try-out period joined the 101st Paratroop Regiment, which was started by Ariel Sharon in the '50s as a counter-terrorist unit against the Arabs coming from Jordan and attacking Jewish settlements.

"It's a historical unit, and I'm proud to be part of it," said the soldier, whose induction ceremony at the Western Wall was in May.

As a grandson of Holocaust survivors, joining the army means a lot to him. "During the Holocaust Jews were defenceless, and now they are not. I'm happy to be part of it all.

"It's not just an adventure, although it does beat wearing a shirt and tie," he said.

Although his Israeli colleagues cannot understand why he would leave the comforts of his North American home to join the army, "they do think it is cool that I'm there. It also [impresses] them to see Jews from around the world coming out to help them," Michael said.

Dacks does not know of any other paratroopers from Toronto, but there are several from other parts of Canada.

His home in Israel when he is not on duty, is at Kibbutz Ramat Rachel in Jerusalem, where he has been adopted by a family for the duration of his stay.

Na'amat celebrating 75 years in Canada

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On the 75th anniversary of Na'amat Canada, Norma Barkin recalls one of her favourite and most meaningful wedding gifts – a life membership to the organization.

The gift was given to her on her wedding day in 1956 by her mother-in-law Faigel Barkin, a founding member of Club One, the organization's first club in Canada.

Barkin, a life member of Club Beersheba and a past Toronto president, said that through the years, the organization "has given me a sense of the importance of Israel and the Labour Zionist philosophy. It has also taught me not to be part of the 'me' generation – that it is important to give and to care."

Na'amat began in Israel in 1921 as Moetzet Hapoalot (Council of Working Women) to deal with women's issues within the pioneer society. The founders believed in social justice, co-operative living, equality of opportunity and shared responsibility.

The organization, which now has about 3,000 members across the country and about 900 members in Toronto, came to North America in 1925 as Pioneer Women. In the same year, clubs were formed in Toronto, Winnipeg and Montreal.

Its mission is to enhance the status of women, children and families in Israel and in Canada by providing financial support for such things as technological high schools, day-care centres, legal aid services, domestic violence counselling centres, shelters and vocational retraining, as well as educational programs.

After 75 years, said Barkin, "our goals remain the same, and we attract the same caring, committed women. Na'amat has its own magic; it's something intangible that defies explanation. There is a thread that just keeps going. We've made long-lasting friends that have become like family."

Ruth Mirsky, whose mother-in-law Sylvia Mirsky founded Chadera, the organization's second club in Canada, has also been a member since the day she got married.

"Being a member of Pioneer Women was part of my wedding contract," Ruth said jokingly.

Lorraine Levene, executive director of Na'amat Canada Toronto for 25 years, said she has watched the younger generation of Na'amat members grow up with the same dedication as their mothers.

"Three years ago, a group of about 22 young teenagers formed Club Aviva, and they have been active, dedicated fundraisers. Some of these girls' mothers have joined Na'amat because of their daughters," Levene said.

Another past Toronto president, Louise Cornblum, whose mother Gertrude Fein was also a member of Club Chadera, said, "My mother was educated in Canada, and Sylvia [Mirsky] needed her for her English skills. She was president of the chapter for 10 years; I've been involved all my life, and now my daughter belongs. It gives purpose to our lives."

Cornblum and her husband Murray "spiritually" adopted the first child in the organization's Growing up with Na'amat campaign, which was introduced in 1960 by Sylvia Mirsky.

"I met the boy at a Na'amat centre on my first trip to Israel. He was needy and in emotional pain; he haunted me. He needed hugs; to me, adopting a child is sending hugs," Cornblum said.

In recognition of its 75th anniversary, Na'amat has already broken ground for an addition to the Na'amat Canada Technological High School in Hadera it had built in 1989. "When we first built the school after raising $1 million, we intended it to have a student population of 225. Now there are 430 students, and we turn away 100 a year, said Levene.

A soft voice, but a heart that screams hate

Last Sunday, the New York Times featured a page 1 article about the 64-year-old spiritual leader of Hamas, Sheik Ahmed Yassin. In unembellished, one might even say, understated tones, the journalist, John F. Burns juxtaposed the meek appearance of the "small, wizened, straggly bearded man in a wheelchair" with the man's violent teachings "sketching a future of unremitting warfare until Israel is wiped from the map."

The headline over the article aptly encapsulated the juxtaposition described by Burns: "As Mideast Talks Peace, Soft Voice Calls for War."

In a fitting irony of journalistic relevance, the article appeared on a weekend in which there was a great deal of news concerning radical Islam-inspired terrorism.

In the early hours of Sunday morning, Israeli security forces clashed with Hamas operatives near Nablus; a number of casualties ensued, including the death of three Israeli soldiers.

A day before, a report appeared in western newspapers that a group of Islamic extremists with possible links to Osama Bin Laden had been been uncovered in Auckland, New Zealand, plotting what appeared to be an attack against a nuclear reactor in Sydney.

Earlier in the week, a joint Israeli-PLO security operation swept up 23 persons involved in the planning of terror actions inside Israel. One of the men captured was a member of Hamas; he was said to have trained in a camp in Pakistan run by Osama Bin Laden.

Murder and misery towards the "other" are the lessons that men such as Sheikh Yassin and Bin Laden teach. And while it may be true, as the New York Times headliner wrote in the case of Yassin, that they speak with a "soft voice," their hearts scream a cold hatred.

The "other" in their sermons is almost always the Jew, the Jew who turns toward Jerusalem during his daily prayers, the Jew for whom Jerusalem is and has been, for 2000 years, the focus of religious and national dreams, and especially the Jew who is embodied in the restored, sovereign state of Israel.

But as the Jewish community knows – and most people in the United States as well – if the blood-lusting of the sheik and of his colleague hiding somewhere in Afghanistan is aimed first at the Jews, it will soon be aimed at the West too.

Canada has a role to play in constantly condemning the exhortations to violence by these twisted teachers and in preventing, wherever and however possible, both the financing and the execution of the acts they inspire.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

New Israeli historians deny history

The new historians in Israel ruinously reconstruct Israel's founding account of patriotism, heroism and sacrifice, and question Israel's very legitimacy as a Jewish homeland. They also ignore the threats to Israel's survival in the 1967 war. Instead, we are treated to an account that speaks of re-entering Jerusalem in 1967, as merely one more scene in just one more battle in which Israeli soldiers capture an outpost.

Gone are pictures of the paratroopers, kissing the Ancient Wall, with tears flowing down their faces. Gone is the emotion of a people whose very soul has been nurtured and sustained through the heartfelt prayer, "L'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim."

After a 19-year division of the city (1948-67), when the Jews could not approach their Kotel, the unification was understood by them as a homecoming to their ancient capital.

Where are the educators who should cry out against the injustice done by failing to preserve our sacred history?

We know that many young Israelis, including educators, are cynical, but there are parents and grandparents who can attest to the truth of the struggle, the selflessness, dedication and great sacrifices that led to Israel's independence.

What will happen when these witnesses are gone?

The aim of education must be to inspire the young generation to appreciate the values and accomplishments of their national heroes. It must also instil a sense of pride in their national history and identity.

I agree that history must be studied with all its unsightly warts and grim realities, but history cannot be manipulated to fit with current political moods and agendas. It is the denial of our history.

Yarkon river still polluted

As your Aug. 10 editorial pointed out, the bridge collapse at the 15th Maccabiah opening ceremonies in Israel three years ago was followed by much buck-passing as to who bears responsibility for the tragedy.

The buck-passing has apparently stopped, now that the World Maccabi Union (WMU) official who organized the ceremonies has been convicted of causing death by negligence and two other top WMU officials have resigned their posts.

Considering that at least some of the deaths and injuries were caused by the poisons that pollute the Yarkon River, it seems scandalous that those who let it become a cesspool of toxic wastes have not been charged as well. As if to add insult to injury, nothing has changed in the three years since the tragic event; the Yarkon remains as polluted as ever.

Advising about Judaism

Jennifer Fox writes (CJN, Aug. 10) that, as the cultural/religious ambassador of Judaism in Halifax, she feared giving her non-Jewish friends there at times wrong answers to their questions about who and what is a Jew. In this regard, I answer my enquiring friends, Jewish and non-Jewish, in Ottawa positively.

I tell them that anyone who observes the seven do's and don't's in the Ten Commandments and volunteers financial support for Jewish causes is a Jew. The first three commandments are a preamble proclaiming the oneness of the Author – monotheism.

Opposed to monotheism is polytheism. It features no behavioural criteria and can result in the wilful conduct of "Handsome is as handsome does."

The monotheism of the Jew mandates "noblesse oblige," noble behaviour in accordance with the aforementioned do's and don't's which, when rolled into one commandment, constitute the rule of conduct we call the golden rule.

"Do not unto thy fellow men what is hateful to thee; this is the whole Law [of God]; the rest is commentary" states Hillel who was one of the most revered Jewish spiritual leaders and who lived during the latter part of the first century BCE and the beginning of the first century CE. I have no doubt that he influenced the Jewish preachers, Jesus included, of that time.

And so I theorize that God is the Ultimate Idea that inspires observance of the golden rule.

The founder of Supersol

In Rabbi Gunther Plaut's column, "Saluting Charles Bronfman," (CJN, Aug. 10) he states: "He [Bronfman], together with his friend the late Ray Wolfe, introduced the first supermarket to Israel and thereby initiated a new era in Israeli marketing."

While Bronfman served on the board of directors of Supersol, as the new supermarket chain was named, he most certainly was not the prime mover and shaker behind it. That was my father, Bertram Loeb, who brought the IGA food franchise to Canada and was the chairman and CEO of M. Loeb Ltd. It was on a Bonds Mission to Israel in the '50s, when he met David Ben-Gurion, that the idea first came into being.

Ben-Gurion asked my father what he did for a living in Canada. When he replied that he ran a chain of supermarkets, Ben-Gurion dared him: "Why don't you open some here?"

Always one to rise to a challenge, that was all my father needed to hear, and the first Supersol store opened in 1957.

Botchki: A history lost and found

By BERNIE M. FARBER
Special to The CJN

I still recall with great fondness, as a young child, those evenings when my father returned home from our small grocery store in time to tell me stories of the old country, and the small Jewish shtetl of Botchki, where he was born and raised.

The stories were a source of joy to my brother and me. But even as children, we could feel the sadness of each tale, for the Jews of Botchki were ultimately consumed in the fires of the Holocaust. Only my father and his nephew Wellie survived.

Botchki was a small Polish town nestled in the woods of the Byeloviezh Forest in the Podlasie region, 20 kilometres east of one of Poland's largest cities, Bialystok.

It was home to 700 families, almost half of whom were Jews. For most of my childhood, Botchki was almost like a mythical village in whose woods my father played as a child and from whose memory my father drew the bubbe mayses which he delighted in telling my brother and me in the evenings before we went to bed.

Stories such as Lakesh bear, perhaps a precursor to Winnie the Pooh, stories that I have shared with my children and which hopefully will be passed on to their children.

Both my brother and I were captivated by this small shtetl of Botchki. What was life like in the Poland of pre-World War II? Electricity, running water, indoor bathrooms? Unheard of, unimaginable.

Secularism was an unknown concept to the Jews of Botchki. Orthodoxy imbued all aspects of their daily lives. And the stories he told, mostly true, some embellished, were of a people who embraced their lives, poor as they were, with gusto and religious fervour.

I remember, for example, the story of the first time the good people of Botchki saw a person of colour. As my father told the story, he was a peddler from West Africa who set up one day, unbeknownst to anyone, in the market in the centre of the little village.

I recall my father's sea-blue eyes dancing with the memories as he told us of how Botchkivites reacted to this simple peddler. While many were just stunned, some Jewish parents fearing the unknown shut their children indoors; the gentile citizens of Botchki crossed themselves and spat over their shoulders to ward off any nearby hovering evil spirit.

Then there was the time of the great fire. Tragically, much of Botchki was destroyed by the fire. I was told that my grandfather, Mordechai (after whom I am named), the shtetl miller, was a member of the fire brigade. My father described how he battled the blaze with the other villagers.

Botchki's rabbi was held in great esteem. He was consulted by the town's Jewish citizens for almost every major decision they might need to make. Interestingly, however, despite the good rabbi's wisdom, my father remembers the rabbi's son, Meryl, as being a child with very much a mind of his own and who had a great deal of difficulty staying out of trouble.

Family photo circa 1932 (counterclockwise from right) Zisel Farber (Max Farber's wife), Max Farber, sister-in-law to Max Farber and her infant child name unknown, Mordechai Farber, unknown woman, Yitzchak Farber (Max Farber's youngest son), Shalom Farber (Max Farber's eldest son).

Indeed, Meryl's antics became fodder for many stories my father told us as we grew.

Thus, Botchki and all it stood for remained firmly planted within my memory.

So much so that in 1992, two years after my father's death at the age of 92, my wife Karyn and I were drawn to Botchki when we were chosen to be leaders on the third March of The Living educational mission which brings young Jewish teenagers to Poland and Israel.

While in Poland, we took a day and with a translator in tow (with thanks to the Canadian Embassy) we made our way to the fabled shtetl of Botchki.

Upon entering Botchki's town limits I understood clearly my father's tale about how Botchki received its name. Perched on the tops of trees and high fences were a multitude of storks, in Polish known as botch.

As we entered the town, it was as though we were transported back in time. The streets were still, for the most part, cobblestone or dirt roads. My father's nephew, Sam Fishbain, had a picture of my father's home and this, along with crude directions from the local postmaster, enabled us to find the house in which my father and his family had lived.

I knew the house the moment I saw it. The villagers told us it had remained vacant for many years. It seems that ever since the Jews of Botchki were murdered by the Nazis, the four successive families who have lived in the home had met with tragic accidents of one sort or another. As a result, the town priest suggested that the ground under the house was contaminated by the evil eye. The house was thus condemned to be destroyed in a few weeks.

As I wandered through the house, I remembered my father telling me that his children's bedrooms were upstairs (Shalom and Yitzchak, ages 9 and 13 were amongst the 280 Jewish inhabitants of Botchki transported to Treblinka where they were murdered).

As I looked out the back window of the kitchen, I saw the railroad tracks that ran behind it and the forest beyond. It instantly rekindled the memory of my father who told us how he had one evening, during the Nazi occupation, escaped over the walls of the Botchki ghetto to try to find some food for his starving family.

Upon returning, he was scooped up with the rest of the Jews of Botchki and the surrounding villages and forced into a cattle car where miraculously he found his nephew Wellie. He searched desperately for his wife and children but was unable to find them.

In a daring attempt to save their lives Wellie and my father jumped off the moving train.

We left Botchki with heavy hearts and the realization that the Nazis had succeeded in their deadly work of making Botchki and indeed all of Poland Judenfrei.

We took a memento home with us from my father's house: the door to the oven, the source of warmth in the home once filled with joy but now filled with ghosts.

Max Farber's home in Botchki as it appeared in 1992.

With my father's death I feared that any further knowledge of the history of Botchki would be lost forever. Incredibly, this was not to be the case.

Just prior to Passover this year, I was leafing through the Jewish Chronicle of London. As I was browsing through its book section the title of a new publication, Botchki, by David Zagier, jumped out at me.

I had to get this book. On the Internet I discovered the book was only available in Great Britain. A hurried call to a colleague of mine at the British Board of Jewish Deputies secured a copy of Botchki which was rushed to me via international courier.

As I raced through the book hungrily reading every page my eyes welled with tears. Here was my father's story. Here were the tales – the African peddler, the great Botchki fire, stories of Meryl, the Rabbi's son, and much more.

Zagier who left Botchki in 1927, filled in the missing pieces. For example, while I knew about the great Rav of my father's shtetl I now knew his name, Rabbi Hannan.

The author also writes in vivid detail of the only pogrom suffered by Botchki's Jews in 1915. My father never told us of the morning in the late summer of that year when the Cossacks galloped into town trampling an elderly woman under their hooves.

The Jews, fearing for their lives, fled to the safety of the forest whose trees and darkness embraced and hid them.

The book has become part of my personal family history. With the passing of my father there remains only cousin Wellie, my late father's last surviving nephew.

Wellie, who never fully recovered from the trauma of the war, today lives in northern Quebec. Sadly, we rarely hear from him; his memory of those years has been washed away.

Zagier's book, however, has inspired me to make contact with him so that I might share with him this wonderful treasure.

The epilogue in the book, written by Zagier's daughter after the author's death last year, jolted me. It reads in part:

"Wellie Farber has not figured by name in this book, but was one of Dovid's English students in the late 1920's. He and one companion jumped off the transport train on the way to Treblinka and hid in the forests for the remainder of the war after which he obtained a visa for Venezuela, together with a brief transit visa for the United Sates. While there, he managed to locate my father in Washington and told him of the fate of the Botchki Jews.

"All had been transported to Treblinka on Nov. 2, 1943. So far as he knew, all had gone immediately to the gas chambers. There were no other survivors."

Cousin Wellie's companion was my father. And now, thanks to this incredible acquisition, I know the date in which my father's family, including my two half brothers, Shalom and Yitzchak perished. Now, with this newly found history, I can light a yahrzeit candle for them and all the Jews of Botchki.

Bernie M. Farber is the executive director of CJC Ontario region. He is the son of the late Gertrude and Max Farber. Max was one of the only Jewish survivors of Botchki, Poland.

Elie Wiesel in Germany

Jan. 27 of this year was observed as Holocaust Remembrance Day in Germany, and Elie Wiesel was invited to address the German Parliament. Here are some excerpts of his talks, which are translated from the German.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

As he does so often, Wiesel began with a story, one that I had never heard before: In a faraway country there lived a good king. One day his astrologers told him that the coming harvest would be cursed and all who ate from it would lose their minds.

The king had a special silo built, in which he assembled what was left over from the last harvest, and he gave the key to his closest friend and told him this: "When my subjects and their king lose their minds and become insane, you alone shall have the right to obtain proper nourishment from the silo. In this way, you will escape the curse but you will incur thereby a terribly important task.

"You will have to wander through the world, from one country to another, from town to town, from marketplace to marketplace and from person to person, and to all of them you have to proclaim: 'Dear people, don't forget that you are insane. Men and women don't forget, please don't forget that you have lost your minds!'"

This was a story by Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav. Wiesel told it because, he said, the 20th century was a period when insanity became a rampant disease, and that is why witnesses have to proclaim: "Do not forget that you were insane. Do not forget that history was its witness."

Wiesel went on to say something he has said often before: "I do not believe in collective guilt; only the guilty are guilty, only they and their accomplices. Not those who did not live then and certainly not the children. The children of murderers are not murderers, they are children."

Wiesel then addressed the president of the Federal Republic, who not long before had spoken in Israel and asked Jews for forgiveness. Wiesel now challenged the German Parliament to do the same.

"Beg the Jewish people to forgive Germany for what the Nazi Reich did in Germany's name to so many of us. Do that and your words will reverberate throughout the world. Do that and the world will know that its trust in the new Germany is truly justified."

He concluded with yet another story: An eight-year-old girl was murdered in Birkenau with her mother in 1944. She had done nothing that could have harmed Germany – yet she had to suffer a ghastly death; and even if her brother became as old as the world, he would never understand it.

That is why he quoted another chassidic master: "Dear friends, do you want to find the spark? Then look for it in the ashes."

The speaker, Elie Wiesel, was the brother.

The other side of the fence?

A local Jewish educator urged me to write about Jewish education, a topic I have avoided because my own Jewish education was an adult experience, rather than that of someone who received a Jewish education as a child.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Our three children attended both day school and supplementary schools, however, and as a parent and board member, I chalked up plenty of hours around their classrooms.

Our oldest child, Adam, entered first grade in Jerusalem in 1974. We chose the state-sponsored religious school Paula Ben-Gurion for him. The first shock I had was that Adam's teacher was "Morah Miriam." I was not used to having children call their teachers by first names. Sounded progressive to me. But then…

A few days later, Adam informed us that his school shared the premises with a non-Jewish school. How was that? The kids over the fence didn't wear kippot, so he assumed they were not Jewish. Paula B-G was in fact two schools, one religious and one secular. I have no idea what it is today, but the thought that for a whole year our son would play next to other Jewish kids and never cross the wall was, to say the least, weird.

I cite this incident (there were others) because it typifies a major division in Israeli society, the religious-secular divide that begins in elementary school and disrupts the country. Jews in Canada don't face that – or do we?

I am not asking a Torah U-Mesorah, Solomon Schechter, Peretz or Leo Baeck school to renounce its philosophical principles. We choose our children's Jewish education with the intention of exposing them to those conceptions of Judaism which we share, or at least would like our children to follow.

But I am concerned about the unspoken messages we send our children. I would like both parents and educators to consider the following questions.

Are your students taught that there is only one acceptable interpretation of a text?

Do they engage the text? If they learn Rashi, do they also hear the Ramban's disagreement with him? My kids were simply told the meaning of the text, with no debate.

Do the students meet with children or teens from other schools or share sports days with schools of other movements? Do the schools hold joint professional development days? What messages about Judaism's diversity are being taught?

Do the rabbinic teachers come from more than one denomination, either as regular teachers or as guests?

Does the school accommodate children with special needs, or are their parents told: "We have high standards and frankly, if Yankel doesn't measure up, don't send him here?"

There will be children in the school whose parents are gay. There will be children in the school who are gay. What message are they sent?

Is anyone watching for abused children? In my children's classes, there were kids with black eyes. Their friends knew they were beaten. Why did the school do nothing? Why did we as parents do nothing?

A great deal of discussion about Jewish education at a community level is about money – how much the federation or the board of Jewish education is giving each school.

Little time is spent on viewing children's Jewish experiences as a system, each part contributing to the whole. School, whether day or supplementary, camp, youth group are all parts of the whole of our children's education. Is anyone taking time to integrate them all? Is there as much support for a summer experience as for a day school education? There should be.

Finally, does the school make community service – gemilut chasadim (acts of kindness) a part of the school curriculum? Are teens collecting money for general causes, like AIDS, cancer and/or homeless shelters?

Do the students learn about other facets of the community and its needs?

Jewish education is more than Hebrew and text. It should open up possibilities and attitudes we may not share but must respect. Otherwise, we won't recognize those kids on the other side of the fence.

When a Luddite gets wired to the world

I have been the dean of the University of Windsor Law School for almost two months. When I accepted the position, I knew that the learning curve would be steep. After all, every university and every law school is different.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

I knew that I would have to learn a new set of policies and procedures. I would have to familiarize myself with a new set of priorities. I knew that I would be entering the university and the law school in the middle of ongoing projects and initiatives. And, of course, I would become acquainted with an entirely new array of personalities. Frankly, I think all of that has gone fairly well – not flawlessly but fairly well.

What has been much tougher to grasp, however, is another aspect of the job – the technology.

To explain this, let me go back a bit. As my children are fond of saying, my wife Nancy and I are modern day Luddites – people opposed to new technology.

I know you will probably not believe me, but in our home in Edmonton, we have only one telephone line. We have a computer (we're connected!) but it uses the same line as our telephone. According to the children, this puts us in the category of "cave dwellers." We do not have a cellular phone, fax machine or cable modem. The only reason we have all the channels as part of our cable package is because Videotron requires us to purchase them in order to get Home and Garden Television. We could be perfectly happy with just the all-news channels, the sports channels, and HGTV. We do not have a "dish" to enhance our television viewing and we have only one working VCR.

So I move to Windsor. I have a computer. No problem. I had one of those at the University of Alberta but it didn't have Lotus notes. This is not a system for a "techno-cretin" such as me. I was given a laptop, also with notes. Then came a Palm Pilot.

The first problem is that all of these devices come with manuals. The manual for the Palm Pilot is over 200 pages long! Am I going to read all this material? Not on your life!

The second problem is that all these gadgets are useless unless they can "talk" to one another. Achieving synchronization is a task almost as daunting as splitting the Red Sea. Now add to this mix my new cellular phone with its manual, and I really have "issues." I do not think, though, that the phone has to talk to any of the other gadgets. At least, I hope not because I am having trouble figuring out how to actually make or answer a call. So, usually I just keep it turned off.

Then there are the "numbers." My family is living in Edmonton for another year and I still have some projects going on there. So I have all my old numbers but I also have new numbers – home, office, cell, fax, fax authorization, message boxes, long distance codes, phone card numbers, security codes, and even lock combinations. And there are the passwords, erroneously so called because they are not "words."

The weird combinations of numbers, letters and punctuation marks may make sense in Vulcan but not in English. They are designed to foil the person trying to break into one's systems. They are very good because I have been unable to access my systems several times already. Frankly, I am having a hard enough time remembering where the bathroom is!

So here I am on a Friday afternoon stranded, because my Palm won't "sync" with my Lotus notes.The battery on the cellphone has died. I'd like to send a fax but I cannot remember my authorization number. I can't recall the password on my laptop. I would like to get my phone messages from my home phone but I cannot exactly recollect the number I am supposed to dial to retrieve the messages. I have forgotten my home phone number altogether. Thank heavens, my furniture is late in coming from Edmonton because I am sure I have forgotten how to program my television and VCR.

Oh well, Shabbat is coming. Baruch HaShem!

Urban planning as a political exercise

When the Six Day War broke out in June 1967, Israel warned Jordan to remain on the sidelines. Beset by pan-Arab pressure and duped by Egyptian misinformation that Israel was losing the war, King Hussein ignored Israel's admonition and commanded the Arab Legion to shell the Jewish sector in western Jerusalem. He would regret this mistake for the rest of his life.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As a result of King Hussein's miscalculation, Israel captured the eastern section of the city. And then, in the face of an international outcry, the Israeli government annexed it, creating one seemingly indivisible city under Israel's control.

I was in Jerusalem a month after these historic events, hailed by most Israelis as a golden moment signifying its physical unity after 19 years of bitter division.

In the aftermath of Israel's military victory, the narrow alleyways of eastern Jerusalem, redolent of heady spices and herbs, were clogged with Israeli and foreign tourists enchanted and intrigued by its exotic flavour. Outside the old city walls, Israeli bulldozers were busy widening and paving roads connecting western and eastern Jerusalem. To me, it was crystal clear that the status quo ante would never be resurrected again. Jerusalem, Israel's capital, had been transformed within a few short weeks.

What I did not quite realize during that memorable summer was that Israel was physically strengthening its grip on east Jerusalem, populated exclusively at the time by Palestinian and Jordanian Arabs.

Israel adopted two principles that would henceforth guide its policy in Jerusalem, according to a new book, Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem (Harvard University Press).

The first principle was to encourage Jewish settlement there. The second was to hinder the growth of the Arab population, write the authors, Amir Cheshin, Bill Hutman and Avi Melamed.

Cheshin, a retired Israeli army colonel, was Mayor Teddy Kollek's assistant as well as his senior advisor on Arab community affairs. Hutman was a reporter on the staff of the The Jerusalem Post. Melamed was Kollek's deputy advisor on Arab affairs, and Ehud Olmert's advisor on Arab affairs after he ousted Kollek in the last election. By their admission, Cheshin and Melamed had "a say" in formulating Israeli policy in eastern Jerusalem.

The logic behind it was unassailable. Whoever physically dominated eastern Jerusalem would determine its fate. Demography was thus at the core of the policy. If eastern Jerusalem was primarily inhabited by Arabs, Israel's claim to it would always be shaky. But if the majority of the its residents were Jewish, the chances of it being redivided again would be greatly reduced, if not altogether eliminated. Israel, therefore, made the Jewish resettlement of eastern Jerusalem – where Jews had lived before the 1948 war – a national priority.

In line with this objective, Israel did what it could to prevent the expansion of eastern Jerusalem's Arab population. By last year, 70 percent of greater Jerusalem's population was Jewish – 455,000 Jews compared to 195,000 Arabs. Viewed from that perspective, the policy has succeeded.

The authors claim, not without justification, that Israel turned urban planning in Jerusalem into a political exercise. Kollek's grand plan contained the elements upon which Israel's housing policy in eastern Jerusalem is still based: expropriation of Arab-owned land, construction of large Jewish neighborhoods, and limitations on development in Arab areas.

Work commenced on the first two Jewish neighborhoods in East Jerusalem – Ramat Eshkol and Ma'alot Dafna – in 1968. Two years later, plans were approved for an additional two nighbourhoods, Neveh Ya'acov and East Talpiot. Since then, seven more Jewish neighbourhoods have been built there, for a total of 11.

Israel, in building these residential enclaves, expropriated Arab lands in several grand sweeps: January 1968, August 1970, March 1980 and April 1991. In doing so, Israel expanded Jerusalem's size from 38 square kilometres before 1967 to 108 square kilometres by 1991. Refusing to recognize Israel's administration in eastern Jerusalem, Arab landowners invariably refused to accept compensation for their expropriated properties.

Eastern Jerusalem shimmers in golden light.

By way of trying to mollify Arab public opinion, Israel sponsored two small housing projects for the Arabs of Jerusalem. However, one of the projects lay beyond the city's boundaries and Israeli Arabs were given preference over Arabs from eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank.

Funding was also a problem. According to an Israeli report written by Reuven Merhav, a former director-general of the foreign ministry, Arabs were short-changed in terms of the level of services and infrastructure.

"The funding discrepancy created a situation in which the gap between Jerusalem's Jewish and Arab sectors grew more severe each year, as improvements were made in the Jewish sector while the Arab sector was largely ignored," the authors observe.

A few examples will suffice. West Jerusalem contains 680 kilometres of roads, while East Jerusalem has 87 kilometres. In western Jerusalem, 743 residents share one kilometre of sewage piping, but in the eastern sector, the same length of piping supplies the needs of 2,809 people. There are 700 kilometres of sidewalks in the western part, but only 73 kilometres in the east.

In retrospect, Israel has compiled a mixed record in eastern Jerusalem.

Despite its efforts to contain Arab growth, the Palestinian population has continued to rise in proportion to the Jewish population. Nevertheless, nearly half of eastern Jerusalem's population today is Jewish.

Having hoped to create the impression that Arab residents had implicitly accepted Israel's hegemony in eastern Jerusalem, the Israeli government tried to induce Arabs to vote in municipal elections. But they have almost universally boycotted these elections.

Israel, too, has been unable to reform the Arab education system. Israeli officials were under the illusion that they might be able to influence Palestinian children to be supportive of the Jewish state. But this scheme fell far short of the mark, while private schools under Jordan's auspices turned into a haven for Arab parents who did not swant their children to be indoctrinated by Israeli schools.

In summing up, Cheshin, Hutman and Melamed are critical of Kollek and his associates. For years, they outlined a vision for a stable, conflict-free Jerusalem. But in practice, they charge, Kollek and his colleagues laid "the groundwork for increased tensions and conflict."

Israel built beautiful new Jewish neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem on expropriated Arab lands and provided them with modern services, but allowed Arab neighbourhoods to decay. If Israel's policy had been different, they argue, tensions could have been eased and Israel would not have jeopardized its claim to eastern Jerusalem, the sticking point in last month's inconclusive Camp David summit.

It is a highly debatable point. Even if Israel had been more forthcoming toward the Arabs, I strongly suspect the Palestinians would still have been vehemently opposed to Israel's ambitions in eastern Jerusalem.

Harry Potter and poetic truth

Books
Bernard Baskin

My grandson, aged nine, has just devoured the latest of the Harry Potter books – all 750 pages. I am pleasantly astonished. Nathan is not alone. The three previous Potter books have sold 35 million copies worldwide and more than a million in Canada.

But here and there, voices are being raised in alarm and dismay. Aren't children being lured into a world of fantasy and unreality? Aren't they being transported from the realm of truth to a never-never land of illusion and fancy?

These concerns are without substance or foundation. Literature (and this has been the case from ancient days) deals not just with "surface truth" but with what might be termed "poetic truth." It insists that often behind things as they are there is another truth, a different reality, other possibilities. It opens up a world of wonder.

One of the memorable characters of fiction who champions poetic truth is Don Quixote. He is thought insane because he insists on fighting windmills that he calls giants. He attacks a flock of sheep that seem to him armed men. He releases a chain-gang of prisoners because he hates oppression in any form. He fancies himself a knight with a sacred duty to relieve distress and oppose evil. His opponents are many and powerful; they are all the sensible people who wilfully or unconsciously deny poetic truth.

Don Quixote takes up the challenge. He insists that his enemies are deranged if they deny the truth of the imagination. If what he believes is false, then it must follow that there existed no Hector, Achilles, Trojan War, or King Arthur of England, who is still wandering about the world to this day transformed into a raven, and is hourly awaited in his kingdom.

Truth at the poetic level is unpredictable and comes in flashes from time to time to everyone. But especially to those we call poets or prophets, mystics or seers. The fact that such truth cannot be proved in the scientific laboratory does not render it invalid. On the contrary, it is essential to our sanity and well being.

To deny poetic truth we would have to expunge the wealth of aggadah from talmudic and midrashic literature, eliminate mysticism from Chassidism and erase the folklore of eastern European Jewry.

Einstein maintained that what stands at the cradle of true art and science is a sense of the mysterious. He wrote: "One who knows it not, who can not longer wonder, no longer feel amazement, is as good as dead, a snuffed out candle."

Isaac Bashevis Singer believed that if there is such a thing as truth it is not obvious, "but intricate and hidden as a crown of feathers." And Abraham Heschel was sure that the beginning of our happiness lies in the understanding that life without wonder is not worth living. "What we lack is not a will to believe but a will to wonder."

Most of the world's wise men and women are dead. But they look over our shoulders as we expound their texts. They nudge our elbows. And what do they tell us? Why, that men and women have always been sitting down to complain of the iniquity of their times and of the fast-approaching doom of the world. And that one just or brave person has always been found in time to save the city, or to carry the spirit onward. And that the race is worth running, and the game worth playing to the end, and life worth living. This is what literature is all about – including poetic truth.

I HAVE A DREAM

I have a dream, that friends will stay friends forever so that nobody feels left out or sad. They will do that by making compromises and sacrifices to make others feel better.

I have that dream!

I have a dream, that my Grade 5 teacher, Ms. Gruia, could stay with me for my whole life of school, because she makes things interesting – like if there is a boring subject, she'll make a game out of it. I find I'm learning a lot from her. I hope she hears this. Keep up the good work, Ms. Gruia!

I have these dreams!

I have a dream, that nothing horrible would happen. For example, I wish nobody would die of sickness or of accidents, only a peaceful death or of old age. I have this dream, because it has happened to my family before and I felt terrible. I don't want anyone feeling terrible.

I have those dreams!

I have a dream, that everyone would feel special to everyone, and mostly to themselves, because faith in yourself is a HUGE part of life. With no faith, there's no enjoyment in life.

I now have FOUR dreams!

I have a dream, that everyone will find a use in life, because this is the biggest part of having faith in yourself. It's more important to have a good life than a long life. This dream is the most important because it forms all the other dreams.

I have this final dream today!

When is Rosh Hashanah?

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When's Rosh Hashanah this year?

That question can be answered by checking your calendar. But to really understand how the dates of Jewish holidays are set and how the Jewish calendar came is a story that stretches back thousands of years and combines faith with a profound understanding of astronomy. You can begin to unravel the mystery of the Jewish calendar on the great sites on the World Wide Web.

Determining Rosh Hashanah wasn't always as easy as picking up a calendar. Originally, Jews figured their calendar – the month, the year and the festivals – by the testimony of witnesses who had observed the new moon. Later, astronomic calculation was instituted in connection with the calendar, but the Jews were not certain of its exactness and witnesses were still called on. For a very good introduction to the evolution of the Jewish calendar, go to Jewish Heritage Online Magazine [http://www.jhom.com/calendar/index.html].

(I was fascinated to come across a Web site for the Karaites, the sect that follows the written Torah but rejects Jewish oral law and Jewish texts such as the Mishnah and Gemarah. Karaites still adhere to the tradition of actually witnessing the appearance of the new moon over Jerusalem and now file their reports via the Internet [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Forum/3384/kknmr.html].)

Actually, the date of Rosh Hashanah and all the other Jewish Holidays are directly related to the date of Passover. The Torah commands us to observe Pesach in the month of "Aviv" (spring) [http://www.jewishgen.org/mentprog/m_calint.htm]. But with a strictly lunar calendar, the observance of Passover would slip a few days every solar year and we might eat matzah and maror in mid-winter.

To keep the seasons in line, Hillel II established in the fourth century a fixed calendar based on mathematical and astronomical calculations. Hillel's calendar, still in use, standardized the length of months and the addition of months over the course of a 19 year cycle, so that the lunar calendar realigns with the solar years. You can find a more detailed explanation at the Jewfaq Web site [http://www.jewfaq.org/calendar.htm].

If only the Jewish calendar were that simple. For example, as the Webexhibits site points out, instead of the Gregorian calendar's two lengths (365 or 366 days), the Jewish calendar has six variations (from 353 to 385 days) [http://www.webexhibits.org/calendars/calendar-jewish.html]. And if you really want to get down to the nitty gritty of Jewish calendars with all their oddities and exceptions, then you must take a look at Remy Landau's Hebrew Calendar Science [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/1584/]. Landau is a master of the Jewish calendar who answers questions you never knew you had. For example, this amazing site tells you how often the Jewish calendar cycle perfectly repeats itself (no, not every 19 years but every 689,472 years.) Landau has even calculated how often the first day of Rosh Hashanah falls on a Saturday (28.6 percent).

But the Jewish calendar is far more than just calculations and computations. It governs how we act and think of ourselves as Jews.

Rabbi Yitzchak Ginsburgh explains that time is fundamental to Jewish life and that "both the written and the oral Torah open with a distinct awareness of the significance of time. The written Torah begins with the words, 'In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth.' The oral Torah begins with the words, 'From what time on may one recite the evening Shema?'" [http://www.inner.org/times/calendar.htm]

As the weeks approach toward Rosh Hashanah, Rabbi Ginsburgh explains the sanctity of time and how we make use of it. To be a Jew means "to assess life and make decisions from a Jewish point of view, beginning with how one schedules his affairs in his personal appointment book. Then, and only then, can one know 'where' he is in life, and how he can succeed in bringing himself and his portion of the world to their proper and ultimate fulfilment."

Next week, the best Jewish calendars on the Web.

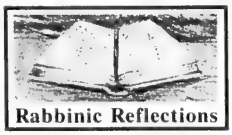
Advantages to a Jewish court

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

One of the favourite topics of the prophets is justice. Yet the Jewish court system is almost unknown amongst Jews.

The recurring theme in the great prophets of the Jewish people is sincerity, getting our outsides and our insides in line. While doing mitzvot on the outside, the prophets demand maintaining a sincere connection to the Creator on the inside. While bringing offerings asking God for mercy, having mercy in turn with our fellow men. And over and over again, the prophets speak of pursuing justice, creating a society of justice.



The Torah portion this week commands the establishment of judges and courts in every city and region. Throughout Jewish history we have had our own systems of justice, distinct from the court system of our host countries.

In some regions in Germany and Poland, there was in fact a law that all disputes between Jews must be brought to a Jewish court, a beit din, and not to a secular court. The secular court system gave full and universal support to the beit din.

The beit din system has its own rules of procedure, its own rules of testimony and its own principles for ruling on cases. It deals with contracts, partnerships, commerce, loans, and all the variety of monetary transactions that are dealt with in the secular legal system.

The laws are developed in the Talmud and Shulchan Aruch, the code of Jewish law.

When there are disputes between Jews, there is a mitzvah to bring those disputes to a Jewish court and not to a secular court.

There is a beit din in Toronto today, as there is in all major Jewish cities. There is a beit din for divorces, for gittin. There is a beit din for conversions. In addition there is a beit din for monetary disputes of which I am the co-ordinator.

The beit din system is undergoing a change in North America. Due to the slow and expensive process of the civil courts, the alternative of going to a beit din is attractive. In addition to the religious requirement of submitting disputes to a Jewish court, there is a now the added incentive of expediency and reduced costs.

However, while the beit din here in Toronto would have 75 inquiries a year, many of which are settled without going to the beit din, with possibly 25 actual court hearings, there are many more cases that bypass the beit din and go directly to court.

Part of the reason for this is the reluctance of attorneys to refer clients to a system where they don't know the outcome. Unless a person is very well versed in Jewish law, the volume of literature and style of writing make it next to impossible for a novice to access the material and predict the outcome.

As a community responsibility, a well functioning beit din is not as dramatic or pressing as tzedakah, education, kashrut and outreach. However, I think the coming years will bring a structure and accessibility to the beit din, indicative of the maturing of the North American Jewish world.

Pursuit of justice in our own Jewish courts, is one of the truly noble pursuits spoken of so often by our great prophets.

Rabbi Tradburks is the spiritual leader at Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto.

Morton Shulman led varied life as doctor, MPP, investment guru

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Morton Shulman, the outspoken and high-profile doctor, cult-hero coroner, politician and millionaire investment guru, died at the Baycrest Centre hospital on Aug. 17 following complications from Parkinson's disease. He was 75.

Obituary

Shulman led a richly varied life and wore many different hats. He was a physician, coroner, MPP, investment adviser and T.V. show host. He also championed the use of the drug Deprenyl to treat Parkinson's disease.

He was not known for subtleties, and seemed to delight in upsetting apple carts. He took on governments, political parties, even the medical establishment.

Lesser known about Shulman was his faith. He didn't wear his Jewishness on his sleeve, but rather in his heart, said his daughter, Dianne Saxe.

Shulman was a member of Holy Blossom Temple from the early 1950s to the later '60s, Saxe said. She doesn't know why he left the temple; perhaps it was because he clashed with its leadership.

"He was not observant but he made a point of visiting synagogues wherever he travelled, whether in China, India or the Caribbean," Saxe recalled. "He always left a gift."

In 1966, Shulman was among the first western Jews to visit Birobidzhan, the former Soviet Union's so-called Jewish Autonomous Region, where he encountered much anti-Semitism.

He also owned a huge library of Holocaust-related books, Saxe said. "He took his Jewishness quite seriously."

Like many young doctors at the time, Shulman found that being Jewish was an impediment. Most large Toronto hospitals hired only two Jewish interns; he managed to convince East General Hospital to take on a third – him.

Shulman was born in Toronto in 1925. After graduating from the University of Toronto's medical school in 1948, he was appointed to the coroner's office in 1952, and became Toronto's chief coroner in 1961.

Almost immediately, he began making waves by criticizing the federal transport ministry for failing to require life jackets in small boats, and the provincial government for not regulating cars more. He attacked clinics, hospitals and cancer doctors he called quacks.

His public outbursts were said to inspire the 1960s television drama Wojeck, about a crusading coroner.

Inspired '60s TV drama

But in 1967, he was fired for accusing Queen's Park of whitewashing a probe into a hospital fire.

By this time, he was already wealthy from his investments in the stock market. In 1966, he published his first of several how-to-invest books, Anyone Can Make a Million.

He turned to politics, winning the provincial riding of High Park for the New Democrats in 1967. Unhappy in the back benches, Shulman clashed with party leader Stephen Lewis, and quit as an MPP in 1975.

Two years later, he was back as host of The Shulman File, an often outrageous tabloid-type talk show on Toronto's City-TV. A dispute with station owner Moses Znaimer in 1983 resulted in the show being dropped.

All along, he maintained his medical practice in Parkdale.

In 1983, he diagnosed himself with Parkinson's disease, and after five years of conventional treatment, he began using a drug from Europe called Eldepryl, which had not been approved in North America.

He touted the drug as a miracle, and bought into the company that held the rights to market it in North America. The drug was approved in Canada under the name Deprenyl, and Shulman soon set up Deprenyl Research Ltd. (now Draxis Health Inc.) whose profits were donated to Parkinson's research. Shulman was chair of Draxis until 1993 – the same year he was awarded the Order of Canada.

He often said he would have died in 1989 had it not been for Deprenyl.

Aside from his daughter, he leaves his ex-wife Gloria Bossin, son Geoffrey; and eight grandchildren.

Study finds 17% poverty level

The results also challenge Canadian Jewish organizations "to increase the resources available to aid Jews who find themselves in poverty."

Moscovitch did not look at income levels, but rather relied on the definition of poverty used by Statistics Canada and most groups concerned with the poor: Low-Income Cutoff, or LICO.

LICO is calculated according to the average amount spent by individuals and families on food, clothing and shelter. In the 1960s, when LICO first appeared, the ratio used was 50 percent of household income. Today, it is 70 percent of income.

Allan Moscovitch

Moscovitch concedes that the LICO calculation is not perfect, but it is the one used by researchers and poverty groups.

The study's overall conclusion is not new – the figure of one in six Jews living in poverty has been the standard benchmark for years – but Moscovitch does unearth some fresh, and troubling, findings.

Chief among them is that the Jewish poverty rate is no better than the general one.

Another is that it is not the Jewish elderly who make up the largest segment of Jewish poor, as commonly thought, but Jewish children and youth. Just over 16,300 Jewish children and young people live in poverty, the study found. That's 27 percent of all Jews, the same ratio as for all Canadians.

The next largest groups of Jewish poor were those aged 40 to 64, and those 25 to 39. The elderly were the fourth largest group of Jewish poor.

For his study, he relied on figures culled from the 1996 mini-census, which did not ask respondents their religion, but rather their ethnic origin. The 1991 census asked about both religion and ethnicity, but Moscovitch rejects those results as out of date.

The '96 census found 350,830 Jews in Canada, 59,520 of whom lived in households below the low-income cutoff.

Other findings of Moscovitch's study are:

• Jewish children and youth were the largest group living in poverty in every region in the country. The poverty rate for Jewish children was highest in Quebec and lowest in Ontario.

• Immigrants represented 40 percent of all low-income Jews in Canada. Most low-income Jewish immigrants arrived between 1991 and 1996. More than 20 percent of poor immigrants arrived before 1961, and they are most likely to be over 65.

• Nearly 21 percent of Jews aged 65 and over were living in poverty, compared with 17 percent of all Canadians in that age group. The poverty rate for Jews 65 and over in Ontario is "substantially" higher than for all Ontario residents. (Moscovitch stresses he did not examine incomes among the elderly. Some elderly, he said, are asset-rich, but cash-poor.)

• Canadian Jewish women were more likely to be poor than Jewish men – 18 percent of all Jewish women, versus 15 percent for men. The highest likelihood of poverty among Jewish women was in Quebec; the lowest was among men in the east.

• A large number of Jewish poor completed one or more university degrees. In fact, almost 58 percent had at least some form of post-secondary education or better. The number of Jewish poor without a high school graduation certificate was only 31 percent.

• The largest number of Canadian Jewish poor (58 percent) lived alone, either single, divorced or widowed.

• Just over 17 percent of all Jewish poor had some form of limitation or disability.

• In Quebec, which has a higher than average population of Jewish seniors, nearly 23 percent of low-income Jews were over 65. In fact, Moscovitch found that the overall Jewish poverty rate in Quebec was higher than the provincial rate.

The biggest challenges facing Jewish leadership, Moscovitch says, are in Ontario, with the largest number of poor because of the high concentration of Jews in that province; and in Quebec, with the highest rate of Jewish poverty.

A further challenge is posed by the large percentage of poor Jewish children and youth.

"Often, Jewish leadership in this country is drawn from the better off," he said. "It's very easy to forget, or not know, how other people live."

Hebrew University sets quotas for students from low-income areas

By RELLY SA'AR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Hebrew University of Jerusalem has decided to admit students from lower socio-economic backgrounds and development towns to professional departments such as medicine, law and psychology, based on a quota system.

The high school education of these students has, until now, prevented them from competing for the limited number of places when candidates come from more prestigious high schools.

The university rector, Prof. Menahem Ben-Sasson said the university intends to allocate five percent of its available places for bachelor degree studies in the select departments to candidates from such backgrounds.

About 12,000 students are currently studying for bachelor degrees at the university, and the new policy will mean that hundreds of students from low-income areas would be admitted to the facility each year. The amendment to the university's admission policy will also help it shake off its elitist image.

The last three years have seen the university set particularly harsh admission requirements, continually raising the entrance requirements in order to absorb only the top students from the country's leading high schools. The university's branch in Rehovot was also closed because the students enrolled there did not fit the image the institute wished to perpetuate.

"Raising the entry requirements was a policy that resulted from the recognition of the place that the Hebrew University must occupy in instructing the state's intellectual leaders at the highest possible level," Ben-Sasson said. "We, therefore, aspired to accept the candidates with the highest bagrut [high school matriculation] and psychometric [university entrance exam] scores."

The university is set to prepare a specific list of the special entry requirements for those candidates who are to be admitted under the quota. The Hebrew University will become the first academic institution in the country to open its doors to a large number of candidates from low-income areas.

Afterword gets new editor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the things Nicole Cohen learned in her first-year journalism class at Ryerson Polytechnic University is that a number of her Jewish classmates had never heard of the Toronto-based Jewish student newspaper, Afterword.

As new editor in chief of the quarterly publication, which has a circulation of 2,000, she hopes to increase its profile so that "every Jewish student in the country knows what Afterword is."

Nicole Cohen

Cohen, 20, took over from Dave Gordon, who founded the paper two years ago after graduating from York University. He will remain on as publisher.

Gordon said he was impressed by Cohen's "fresh ideas, her vision, her strength and her motivation. We found somebody who can continue making Jewish issues accessible to young adults."

"I love journalism," Cohen said over a lemonade at a downtown restaurant. "Every day I am so happy with my school and the career I've chosen. It's given me the opportunity to meet tons of interesting people. I keep learning and growing from it."

Now entering her second year at Ryerson, Cohen got her first taste of journalism as a Grade 11 student at The Collegiate, a "university-style" high school based at the University of Winnipeg.

In her Grade 11 journalism class, she saw a documentary on women who covered war zones. "I thought that was the most exciting thing I'd ever seen. I wanted to do that."

A native of South Africa who immigrated with her family at age 7, Cohen attended Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg. Until 1993, she lived in Saskatoon, where she attended Hebrew school twice weekly until her bat mitzvah.

Before moving to Toronto in 1999, she completed a year of undergraduate studies in English and Philosophy at the University of Winnipeg. At Ryerson last year, she wrote about student activities for the campus paper, The Eyeopener.

Her portfolio also includes a couple of contributions to Afterword, and reviews and features for buster!, an independent music magazine formerly called Rhig.

Among the people she'd like to interview, Cohen mentioned philanthropist Charles Bronfman. "It's a wonderful thing he's done," she said, referring to Birthright Israel, the free 10-day trip for young Jewish adults in which Cohen participated this summer.

A former regional president of B'nai Brith Youth Organization's Red River region (Manitoba), Cohen said BBYO was her "life" for four years. In Winnipeg, she was active in her university's Jewish Students' Association.

In fact, it was at a JSA event, a ski trip to Calgary, that she met Gordon, where he was a guest speaker.

At this year's Afterword conference for Jewish student journalists, Gordon, 27, announced his plans to retire as editor and find a replacement who was "closer to the university age bracket."

Cohen recalls her interview with Gordon and his editorial board, consisting of student volunteers, was "really tough."

Referring to the diversity of Jewish religious and political viewpoints the paper represents, Cohen noted, "we have stories from all over the map."

She intends to continue to follow the current mandate and hopes to put her own stamp on the paper, which she said has "great content and style." One of the things she would like to do is to focus on "individual, average students doing something different or something cool."

The upcoming September 9 issue is a transitional issue, as outgoing editor Gordon passes the torch to her.

Although she knows she will have "politics" to contend with, she is "kind of excited" about the challenge.

Yachdav helps to forge bonds with world Jewry

By LANCE DAVIS
Special to The CJN

Being Jewish means different things to different people. But for the more than 220 participants in the recent international young leadership mission to the Former Soviet Union (FSU) and Israel, it meant at least one common thing for everyone – sharing an experience together. Hence the name of the mission, YACHDAV, jointly subsidized by UIA Federations Canada and other federations across Canada.

A group of young professionals aged 24-44 traveled together from Toronto to meet dozens of other Canadians and over 160 international participants to visit Vilnius, Lithuania, Minsk, Belarus and Israel.

As a young Jewish professional who is deeply committed to being Jewish and who as been actively involved in various young leadership initiatives, I am proud to say that this experience changed my life, as well as the lives of my fellow YACHDAV participants – for the better!

Opinion

We forged new, lifelong friendships with young leaders from across Canada and around the world, who share the common bond of Judaism and the goal of making a difference in the Jewish world. We solidified this connection by experiencing Judaism in communities that are very different from our own and grappling with the role we, as young Jewish leaders, must play in the international Jewish community.

The Canadian group comprised the largest individual contingent with about 70 participants from across the country. Now, we all have new friends throughout Canada and have learned a great deal about what it means to be Jewish in communities other than our own. The Toronto participants have already organized a number of post-YACHDAV follow-up activities and a reunion weekend involving people not only from other Canadian cities, but also from other countries. Ottawa also recently held a YACHDAV reunion.

Those of us representing the Canadian contingent demonstrated leadership, pride and enthusiasm that set the tone for the mission. We patriotically sported our cool red Roots Canada-YACHDAV 2000 hats and we impacted the other contingencies significantly.

Our destination points in the FSU demonstrated the tragic fate of our people during the Holocaust and how presently, faith can be used to ensure these communities prevail in the face of adversity.

Many of us were particularly touched as a result of interactive visits with local Jews. We saw the remaining elements of the infrastructure that at one time existed in these cities and the ways in which the communities are being rebuilt and re-energized.

We then traveled from the dreariness of the FSU to the hope and forward-looking eagerness of Israel. Through our shared experiences, we drew comparisons and contrasts between the destruction in the FSU and the thriving excitement and thrilling pace of development that we observed in our own homeland.

For many participants, YACHDAV offered us the chance to return to the Holy Land. For others, it was the first time visiting Israel. For ALL of us, it was one of the most wonderful, invigorating and motivational experiences of our lives. For me, it was simply the best!

It has been difficult for each of us to return to our daily routines, but we can rest assured that the bonds with each other and with our heritage will grow and endure. We have all learned a great deal about how to treat each other, which will assist us in developing and shaping many aspects of our personal and professional lives, today and in the future.

Lance Davis is national director of young leadership development, UIA Federations Canada.

Ottawa Jew makes history as new judge

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The recent appointment of Heidi Levenson Polowin to the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario, marks the first time in 37 years that a member of Ottawa's Jewish community has been named to the high ranking court.

"I had done everything I wanted to do in my career as a lawyer," said an excited Polowin, "and I see this as a logical next step, to use what I have learned over my twenty-year career and apply it."

A native of Montreal, Polowin is a graduate of Ottawa University Law School. She has worked extensively in labour and employment law and has sat as an adjudicator to hear unjust dismissal complaints on behalf of the federal government.

Polowin has also co-authored a casebook and taught employment law at Ottawa University and has dabbled in human rights, young offender matters and contract and commercial law. Most recently, Polowin was director of legal service for the Children's Aid Society of Ottawa-Carleton.

Joseph Lieff, whose brother Abraham was the last Jewish lawyer appointed to the bench in Ottawa, was happy to hear of Polowin's appointment.

"I am very pleased for Heidi and for the Polowin family," he said. "I think it is an excellent appointment and I am sure she will do well."

Polowin recently enjoyed her first day on the bench. "It is extremely challenging," she said, "but my colleagues on the bench are wonderful. It is a very collegial group."

So far, she has heard civil and family cases but eventually will hear criminal cases as well.

In addition to her professional career, Polowin has always found time for community involvement. She has worked on the United Way Campaign for several years, has served on the board of directors of Temple Israel and is currently on the board of directors of Jewish Family Services.

She and her husband, Steve, are the parents of Jordana and Daniel, both high school students.

What will we be when we grow up?

EDITORIAL

I am going to be a grandmother this winter. When I heard the news, a whirligig of emotions started swirling around in my head.

First, needless to say, I am entirely too young to be a grandmother. My daughter is certainly too young to be a mother – wasn't it just a week or so ago that she was making mudpies? Time is going just too fast.

When I had worked through these feelings, the worries started. Oh, not about my daughter. She will be a great mother, and the baby will grow up in a home full of love, laughter, learning and the joy of religious observance. But what kind of a grandmother will I be? Is there a book that can teach me what to do?

Then more serious considerations start to surface. What kind of world will this baby be born into? We constantly worry about the environment, overpopulation, global warming, world peace and especially peace in Israel. But what about closer to home?

Sometimes, when we look around us, the world can seem very bleak. Violence, especially among the young, seems to be increasing. There are homeless people on downtown streets. We think twice and three times about whether to let our youngsters travel on public transportation.

This is very different from when those of my generation were growing up. Toronto then was a safe place. We took pride in the clean streets, strong moral values, dignity and good manners that were everywhere.

And the Jewish community? Well, of course, that was the same. Jewish men never beat their wives. Child abuse was something "they" did, never us. Poverty didn't exist, and if it did, it was quickly, discreetly and respectfully dealt with. And everyone knew that Jewish kids were never involved in criminal activity, just as Jewish schools, organizations and communal workers were free of any unhealthy influences.

Kosher, in relation to the food industry, meant that the business, besides adhering strictly to the letter of the Jewish law, had the highest level of cleanliness.

We know now that many of these ideas, in both the secular and the Jewish worlds, were myths. Much was going on in the underbelly of the city that only surfaced much much later. Jews are subject to the same stresses as anybody else and are quite capable of behaving, well, the same as everybody else.

As the Jewish community grows bigger and stronger and more affluent, not to mention more accepted into general society (one of us is even running for vice-president of the most powerful nation on earth), we can't help but become more like everyone else.

In the past year, the Toronto Jewish community has been rocked out of its complacency by the murder of a Jewish teenager in a North York park, a stabbing in the parking lot of a Jewish school, and news of a charismatic youth leader in another city who for many years physically, sexually and emotionally abused youngsters he came into contact with, while the powers that be did nothing.

Several highly respected kosher establishments were closed or cautioned for health code violations.

And what about religion? Everyone knows that Jews, whatever their squabbles over non-essentials, come together in times of crisis, especially when that crisis is in Israel. But is that still true?

The media, the synagogue and the kosher supermarkets echo with heated discussions about the peace process in Israel, the future of Jerusalem, debates between the different branches of Judaism, and tension between different parts of the same branches.

Youngsters from one school system often not only do not associate to any great degree with those of another system, but are actively scornful of them. Religious leaders who visit from other places schedule separate meetings with separate parts of the community.

We don't like to admit that this is the way things are. But they are. The Community Focus supplement, the first of the new century, discusses many of these issues. It also shines a spotlight on what some people are doing to make the city a better place in which to live.

And there are wonderful people around who are doing exciting and innovative things. There are thoughtful people who are voices of reason and common sense.

So maybe I don't have to worry so much about my grandchild. Maybe I just have to figure out how to spoil him or her without his or her parents finding out. Maybe by the time that grandchild grows up, the community will also have grown up and become a place where there is genuine caring, compassion and tolerance. Perhaps he or she will be one of those who bring to fruition these positive ideals. That would truly be a blessing.

New approach to tuition subsidies

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A mandate task force committee of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) has developed a new approach to determining tuition subsidies for Toronto day schools.

The committee dropped the current method of using a formula to establish the amount of money each day school would receive from the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, in favour of a simpler approach.

Marshall Kesten

The goal is to eliminate discrepancies in student subsidies from school to school.

The task force, which met for more than two years, analysed the decade-old system of determining tuition subsidies and examined the changing needs in the community. The committee produced a report titled Formula School Funding, which presents a number of recommendations based on a voucher funding model and a loan program.

The recommendations were recently approved by UJA FEDERATION's board of directors and will be introduced in the upcoming school term.

The new system will be calculated using an across-the-board average cost per student. This will require fewer resources to administer than the present system and eliminate funding according to a complex formula based on individual school per capita costs.

"With the changes, every student who requires subsidization will be subsidized at the same level," says Marshall Kesten, chair of the BJE's mandate task force committee.

"From the parents' standpoint, nothing should really change. What this will do, however, is simplify the system at a school level."

Since 1990, Kesten says, average day school tuitions have increased 35 percent. "This has caused some parents to withdraw their children from the Jewish school system."

He notes that the task force committee recommended that UJA FEDERATION give priority to raising the cap on the amount of tuition subsidies. The BJE will form a committee to review the guidelines, with particular focus on middle class families who are feeling the financial strain of school tuitions.

The tuition committee process, which assesses a family's eligibility for subsidies, will continue to be done at the school level. The BJE will redirect resources that were used to administer the previous funding formula to ensure that the tuition committee process is consistent from school to school.

The task force also recommended that a $250,000 to $500,000 pilot project loan program for parents be established. Loans could be offered to supplement subsidies for middle income families as an incentive to keep their children in the system. This funding would come from outside the federation.

Kesten emphasizes the need to make it clear to families in receipt of subsidies that UJA FEDERATION is funding them.

Some of the principles of funding established by the mandate committee are:

- No child should be deprived of a day school education because of a family's inability to pay.
- The primary responsibility for paying for the cost of the child's education rests with the family.
- The determination of financial need for families should be established in a consistent and fair manner irrespective of the school to which they wish to send their children.
- Funding by UJA FEDERATION should promote access to the system to the greatest extent possible and should encourage families to have their children stay in the system as long as possible.

Young Jews in search of community

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

An assemblage of Toronto's young Jews has coalesced for a Thursday night rendezvous, otherwise known as a "Jew-Do."

Sauntering around a gaudy dance club is a motley crew of young men and women, immaculately dressed in the latest trends: colourful tight shirts, capri pants for the women and khakis for the men.

If you manage to get past the fashion show, fake hellos and the abundance of superficial pop culture, the setting seems to be a pantheon for young adult Jews to seek out a Jewish mate and get connected with the community.

I'm going to go out on a limb here and suggest that this Jewish scene, which I confess I am a part of, is not exactly what our grandparents have in mind when they speak about finding a bashert.

Somehow I can't imagine anyone's bubbie recommending donning tight shirts and dancing to reggae music as the best way to find that special someone.

Nor is simply spending an evening with a large number of Jews the most profound way to connect with the Jewish community.

But for many young Jews, the most immediate and perhaps the primary expression of one's Jewishness comes in the form of socializing with other Jews. Nothing more, nothing less.

There are also other young Jews who do not frequent dance clubs, but do have an affinity for music and a thirst for spirituality.

Just look at the droves of Jews who flock to Phish concerts, seeking some sort of borderline religious experience while listening to the band jam for hours.

Or take note of the number of young Jews who zealously read Buddhist philosophy and embrace the various Eastern religions. I have heard estimates that suggest that fully one-quarter of Buddhists in America today are Jews.

The Jews in the night clubs and the Jews at Buddhist temples and Phish shows may be seeking different sources of pleasure, but ultimately, each group is demonstrating a hunger for music and a desire to be part of a community.

Music and community seem to be quintessential aspects of Judaism and the Jewish people.

So what does all of this mean? Young Jews probably do not realize this, but they are searching for common things – catchy music, a sense of belonging to a community, and spirituality.

If more Jewish outreach programs started to take note of what young Jews really yearn for and catered to those desires, then perhaps young Jews would recognize they are indeed connected to a community.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Perception of violence worse than reality, officials say

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

In the aftermath of reports of subway swarmings, the murder of Matti Baranovski and the stabbing of a teenager at a school dance, one might be excused for thinking that life in Toronto is fraught with danger.

Even more concern was generated by seemingly random attacks on people in the Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue area of the city. The sight of wanted posters tacked up in apartment buildings only reinforced that concern.

The question is whether this perception is accurate.

Norm Gardner

Toronto councillor Norm Gardner, chair of the Toronto Police Services Board, doesn't think so.

By and large, he told The CJN in an interview at his office at Metro Police Headquarters, although there certainly is crime here, as there is in any big city, Toronto is basically "a safe city."

Some of the fear comes from the fact that Toronto has a large percentage of aging people. "As people become older, they become more vulnerable," Gardner said. "This vulnerability heightens their anxiety, which makes them perceive either that the danger is greater than it is, or that they are more at risk of becoming a victim."

Most physical injury, he said, "happens among people who know each other, and in gang-related incidents. If you are not involved, there is not much likelihood of anything happening to you."

But you should still use common sense, he said. "Don't walk alone, especially at night. Don't take shortcuts. Use wide, well-lit sidewalks to get to where you are going."

What is a major problem, Gardner said, especially in middle class and affluent areas, is car theft.

"Fifteen thousand vehicles are stolen every year," he said, and "certain areas where there is a large Jewish population will have cars stolen – just like in other middle and upper-middle-class areas."

The murder of Matti Baranovski last fall "by a group of mean-spirited youngsters who viciously kicked him to death," brought the issue of youth violence to the forefront of the attention of the Jewish community.

As he frequently does, Gardner lambasted the Young Offenders' Act, which, he charged, "protects youth to a significant degree."

Very little danger to Jews comes from anti-Semites, he said.

Anti-Semites are "very careful about making physical attacks on people, including on Jews. Most are involved in charges already and are waiting for a court date, so they are trying to keep away from physical situations."

While some seem to blame Russian immigrants for crime, there is little evidence to show that this is true, Gardner said, although "there is some east European crime, and probably some Jews are involved in that," he said.

People come to Canada from all over the world, he said. Often their records have been expunged, and no one knows of their less-than-pristine background.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Protecting our children:

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The teenage girl sits impassively, staring straight ahead, sometimes toying with a pen. She waits outside the office of her high school's principal, who is conferring with a social worker from Jewish Family & Child Service. The two want to get to the bottom of the girl's recent unruly behaviour. Earlier, the girl, 14 and Jewish, had been suspended for three days for drinking. Now, she's alleged that her father had shoved her.

That was enough for JF&CS to be called in. Weighing the allegation against meticulously coded standards on which all social workers rely, and which were amended earlier this year, the agency determined this could be a case of physical abuse.

The emergency call is being handled by Cara Malen, an 11-year veteran of child protection and a contract worker for JF&CS. "You either love this work or hate it," Malen says en route to the girl's school. "I love the newness of every situation. I like the adrenaline rush."

Some, like Malen, may thrive on the buzz, but front-line social workers who specialize in child protection – even in the Jewish community – face enormous stress, not the least of which are situations that range from the merely unpleasant to the gruesome.

"We see a lot of cases of inappropriate discipline from parents," says Malen. "Sometimes, we hear from kids who are afraid to go home. My first instinct is always to believe the child.

"I've seen some pretty horrible things," says the mother of three. "It's stressful work, but we keep doing it. I mean, these kids could be your neighbours."

***

Of the 45 social workers at JF&CS, nine are engaged in child protection.

"It's extremely stressful and demanding and people tend to burn out," concedes the agency's executive director, Gordon Wolfe. But ironically – and tragically – it's the area of social work in which agencies are doing the most hiring.

"The social work jobs today are in child protection," says Wolfe. "All agencies are looking for staff, partly because there's more business, but also because of changing standards."

Often, Wolfe says, qualified people are hard to hold onto and burnout in this area has not spared JF&CS. In the span of three months earlier this year, three of its social workers quit – all of them in the child protection area. Wolfe calls that "significant."

Because of government funding cutbacks to social service agencies, especially over the last five years, child protection workers find they must stay in the field longer because other opportunities have dried up, Wolfe notes.

"But we try to provide other opportunities," he adds, "to balance the stress with other assignments. However, I don't believe it's as stressful here as at other agencies."

Frontline social workers face stress, burnout

JF&CS was accorded Children's Aid Society status in 1980, putting it on par with the large agencies, notably, the Children's Aid Society of Toronto and the Catholic Children's Aid Society. All those are empowered to move proactively, with or without parents' permission, to counsel, intervene, and in extreme cases, actually seize children in danger.

Last year, JF&CS investigated just over 400 allegations of child abuse in the Jewish community – better than one a day. Of those, about a quarter wound up in the courts. Wolfe believes that proportionally, there are fewer allegations of child abuse in the Jewish community than in the general population, but the numbers are still alarmingly high, and social workers' nerves are frayed from the workload and the horrors of witnessing child abuse.

Professionals often must work around 'shame factor'

Mainly, the work of child protection specialists falls into two general areas: investigating allegations, and ongoing monitoring, followups and going to court. Burnout starts, Wolfe says, when a social worker begins to feel that his or her personal life is spiralling out of control.

Abuse too falls into several categories: physical, emotional, sexual. The agency fields calls from kids all the time. "Calls from children are taken very seriously," Wolfe says.

At last count, there were 86 children who are Crown wards in the protection of JF&CS. In turn, they break down into various definitions of temporary care, those in foster care, as well as troubled teens and special needs children in continued care.

Sometimes it's the parents who can't control their kids; sometimes it's the parents who are out of control. Sometimes, it's both.

***

Malen is through talking with the principal and the girl. As with almost all cases of this nature, there's more here than meets the eye.

The girl is one of three children of an immigrant Russian couple. She had already been kicked out of a Jewish day school for smoking, and her behaviour of late has been difficult, even for a teenager. "She may just be trying to fit in," explains Malen, "but the kid needs help. She's been acting out a lot."

As for the parents in this incident, "they lost it. The father is quick to anger."

Malen's followup will consist of discussing with the parents which school the girl should attend next academic year, as well as a strong caution: violence isn't the answer.

Malen terms this call "routine." She feels it isn't necessary to take further action, and is confident the girl's behaviour can be nipped in the bud.

Her next assignment: looking into allegations that a father beat his 4½ year-old son in a nasty custody battle.

All in a day's work.

***

There was nothing routine about Chana's six-month stint as a child protection worker at JF&CS. Armed with a master's degree in social work, Chana (not her real name) had her life threatened by her client's boyfriend after she apprehended the client's two children, who were in the boyfriend's care at the time.

"He had various restraining orders against him, and I heard he had access to a gun."

What did police do?

"Not much," she sighs. "They advised me to get out of town. So I went into hiding. I didn't go home for two weeks. I didn't drive my car for a month. I changed my licence plate."

Chana quit her job but returned to it after the heat died down. However, in February, she quit again after two weeks. "No job is worth my life," she says. "I call this my nightmare."

Chana still lives in fear. The boyfriend knows where she lives and what she looks like.

Between increasing workloads, less staff and incidents like this, Chana says being a child protection worker "is very, very stressful." For her, that's an understatement.

***

Watching Jason Sorokin work the phones is like watching a veteran juggler. He's deft without knowing it.

Just 30, he already has three years of child protection work under his belt with the Durham Children's Aid Society. While Malen is out on the road, Sorokin is on call at JF&CS, manning the phones, working on old cases while doing intake.

Sorokin has dealt with some ugly matters, including an eight-year-old who was being sexually abused by an adult, various incidents of physical abuse, and parents addicted to drugs and booze.

"I try to keep an open mind," he says. "Each case is judged on its own merits."

He takes a followup call from a local high school guidance counsellor reporting on a male student who had a physical altercation with his parents, resulting in bruises. JF&CS investigated and found it to be an isolated incident.

Sorokin and other social workers have noticed that community leaders sometimes play down these kinds of problems, believing that Jewish families aren't affected by them.

"Often," says Sorokin, "we have to work around the shame factor."

The phone rings throughout the day, with calls like these:

A man accuses his ex-wife of neglecting their children. Sorokin's antennae rise on this one, as often, people try to use the system to get back at ex-spouses. "You have to factor in emotions and ill will," he says casually.

There's a followup call involving a developmentally disabled adult female who engaged in a sexual act with an underage boy.

Sorokin also handles a call involving allegations of drug abuse against a stripper who has a 10-year-old daughter. Another call he makes is to a doctor to discuss the care of an anorexic girl whose mother is suspected of sabotaging her treatment.

Red tape, case loads, modest pay, can overwhelm social workers

In between, he makes plans to speak to summer camp counsellors on how to recognize and report signs of child abuse, writes assessments, keeps up with his ongoing workload, and attends a lunch-hour seminar on children who mutilate their own bodies.

It's a hectic pace, and while Sorokin handles it with the ease of a seasoned pro, he's frustrated, as are many social workers, with the amount of paperwork before him.

He estimates that one-third of his time is consumed with paperwork, a routine he calls "tiresome and burdensome. The red tape is stressful. It keeps us bogged down. If we're spending more time on paperwork, we're spending less time working with families."

Sorokin and others observe they have even more forms and papers to fill out since the provincial government revamped the Child and Family Services Act this past spring.

Calm can be deceptive

For years, front-line social workers have relied on the Eligibility Spectrum, a 70-page guide that sets out detailed definitions of thresholds of harm, abuse and risk, all coded in a ratings system.

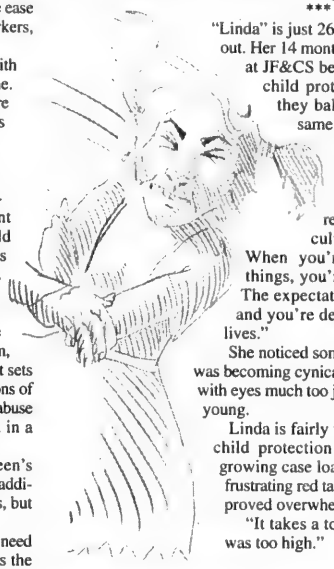
In March, Queen's Park announced an additional $106 million in funding to Children's Aid Societies, but also broadened those definitions.

The new law expands the reasons for finding a child in need of protection. It includes the word "neglect," and lowers the threshold for risk of harm and emotional harm. Officials say it's all designed to tip the scales in favour of the child.

But it will also translate into more work for child protection workers. However, like Sorokin, many committed social workers seem willing to make the sacrifice and work longer hours.

Sorokin sums up his day as relatively calm. "But calm can be deceptive," he says. "Tomorrow, everything can blow up."

***



"Linda" is just 26 but already stressed out. Her 14 months as a social worker at JF&CS began with only a few child protection cases; soon, they ballooned to 35 at the same time.

It was too much. She quit in March.

"It was very demanding," she recalls. "And it's difficult to do successfully. When you're doing so many things, you're spread very thin. The expectations were too high, and you're dealing with people's lives."

She noticed something else too: She was becoming cynical, viewing the world with eyes much too jaded for someone so young.

Linda is fairly typical of the young child protection worker for whom growing case loads, modest salaries, frustrating red tape and small rewards proved overwhelming.

"It takes a toll. For me, the cost was too high."

JNF quenching Israel's thirst

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

Israel is no stranger to vast expanses of agricultural settlements, swimming pools and glasses of water filled to the brim.

But a combination of drought, pollution and overuse of scarce water resources is threatening the Jewish state with a veritable water crisis.

The Jewish National Fund (JNF) has embarked upon a plan to quench Israel's imminent thirst by building 100 reservoirs which will cost $100 million (US).

"Israel desperately needs water," says Ben Prossin executive director of JNF's Ontario region.

"To make people aware of the severe [water] problems Israel is facing," Prossin says, "we are going to embark on selling ...water."

The JNF's tzedakah-style blue boxes which have been primarily used to fund tree planting in Israel, will now also be used to fund the reservoir project. The JNF also hopes to raise money at a gala dinner on Nov. 26 as well as through private donations.

The annual water consumption rate per person in Israel is 100 cubic metres, about 75 cubic metres less than the per capita Canadian consumption.

However, last year, Israelis used 350 million more cubic metres of water than the amount available.

Conserving water is part of the solution and the government has requested that farmers limit or stop planting water consuming crops, such as cotton and corn.

But that is not enough, says Yaen Vered, JNF's Jerusalem emissary to Toronto.

"The figures we have [indicate that] in the year 2050, Israel will need 3.2 billion cubic metres of water" which is nearly double the amount of water resources the country currently has.

Along with building 100 reservoirs, the JNF is on a mission to clean Israel's water so more people can fish like this man.

CONCERNING WOMEN

Increasingly, basic research is addressing the special health concerns of women. At Israel's Weizmann Institute, gifted researchers tackle a widening spectrum of projects impacting on women's health. ❧ Weizmann scientists have developed new MRI techniques for non-invasive diagnosis of breast cancer. Genetic and immunological breast cancer therapies and studies targeting ovarian and cervical cancer are high priorities. Infertility treatments, new contraceptive drugs, better understanding of fetal development, more effective treatments for osteoporosis, and many other areas of particular significance to women are prime research targets. ❧ Enhancing women's health is a global priority that deserves enthusiastic public and private support.

For over 50 years, we have marshaled support for the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel. Its 2,500 scientists, engineers and scientists-in-training are engaged in 1,000 research projects to fight disease and hunger, create new technologies, protect the environment and harness alternative sources of energy.

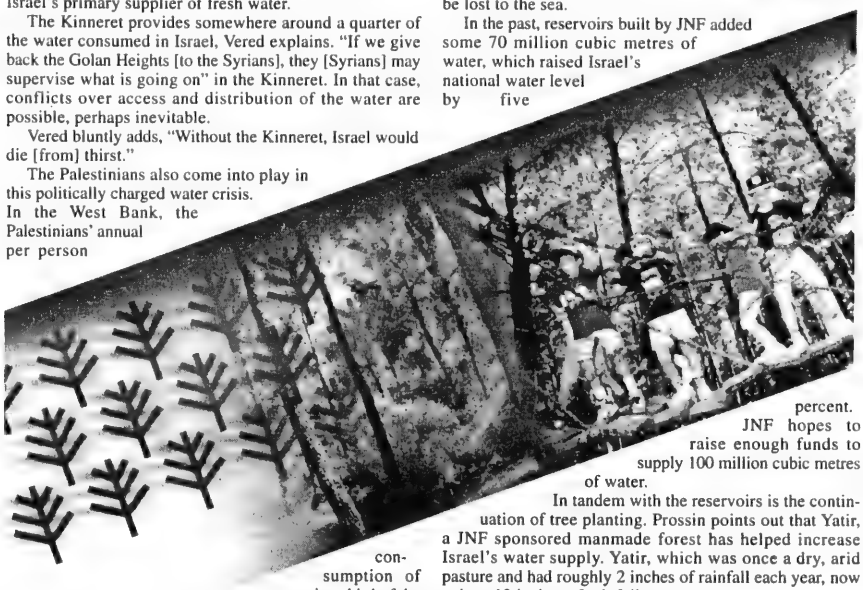
Complicating the water crisis further is the perpetual volatile political climate of the Middle East. Syria, Israel's longtime enemy is seeking a return of the Golan Heights which rests near the banks of the Kinneret (Sea of Galilee), Israel's primary supplier of fresh water.

The Kinneret provides somewhere around a quarter of the water consumed in Israel, Vered explains. "If we give back the Golan Heights [to the Syrians], they [Syrians] may supervise what is going on" in the Kinneret. In that case, conflicts over access and distribution of the water are possible, perhaps inevitable.

Vered bluntly adds, "Without the Kinneret, Israel would die [from] thirst."

The Palestinians also come into play in this politically charged water crisis. In the West Bank, the Palestinians' annual per person consumption of water is a third of the Israelis'.



Vered says Israel will have to give up some of its water resources to the Palestinians in order to sign a peace deal.

That is important to understand because that means that whatever we give up for [water provision] in Arab villages, means a shortening of the water [supply] in Israel, Vered says.

Also, one of Israel's two underground aquifers rests in the West Bank. "If we're going to give this area [of the West Bank] to the Palestinians, we are going to have a severe problem," Vered contends.

The JNF views the reservoirs as a vital venture in temporarily solving the water conundrum.

"The reservoirs are the best," Vered says. "It's the cleanest water ... and we can use it on a permanent basis."

The reservoirs have the potential to capture large quantities of run-off and recycled water that would otherwise be lost to the sea.

In the past, reservoirs built by JNF added some 70 million cubic metres of water, which raised Israel's national water level by five percent. JNF hopes to raise enough funds to supply 100 million cubic metres of water.

In tandem with the reservoirs is the continuation of tree planting. Prossin points out that Yatir, a JNF sponsored manmade forest has helped increase Israel's water supply. Yatir, which was once a dry, arid pasture and had roughly 2 inches of rainfall each year, now enjoys 12 inches of rainfall.

The JNF is also working on projects to make forests in Israel accessible for disabled people by paving wheelchair paths and providing braille signs for the blind.

Prossin says educating young people in Toronto's Jewish day and evening schools about Israel's water crisis, will ensure future generations continue to support JNF's projects.

"The idea is if we start out in the classrooms with the blue boxes, then hopefully [that will establish] a tradition of giving to the land of Israel."

Perry Romberg: Working to build bridges

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Perry Romberg

TORONTO – Perry Romberg, an experienced social worker keen on building bridges in the Jewish community, will be taking over the reigns of director of Planning & Community Development at United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) in October.

Romberg, who has been active in community work for years, told The CJN that his new position is multifaceted. He will be working with Jewish communities across Canada on community building and developing projects, and will work with nationally funded agencies on service issues and budget allocations.

Expressing his excitement with the new position, Romberg said, "One of my skills is consensus building. My hope is that…I will be able to facilitate co-operation on matters and issues of importance to Jews across Canada."

Romberg, a past chairman of the Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation of Toronto, added that the job will give him an opportunity to work with agencies and federations which "look at our community's interest from a very collective and collaborative viewpoint."

A graduate of Associated Hebrew Day School and Sir Sandford Flemming High School, Romberg spent a year in Israel working on a Bnei Akiva kibbutz and studied at Bar-Ilan University.

He received an honours bachelor of science degree and later went on to complete a masters of social work degree

After working for several years, he returned to school, receiving a second master's degree in psychology and a diploma in voluntary sector management from York University.

For 13 years, Romberg worked at the Jewish Family and Child Service of Metropolitan Toronto in such roles as a supervisor of the foster care program, as a child welfare consultant, and clinical manager of the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre.

Moving to the Toronto office of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada, he served as executive director for 10 years.

Two years ago, he joined the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as the assistant director of Community Planning & Allocations.

Romberg, who is fluent in English, Hebrew and Yiddish, has four children and one grandson.

COR moves to ensure health standards maintained

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Since last spring, the health department, as part of a highly publicized blitz on food establishments in the city of Toronto, has closed down and published the names of numerous food facilities that did not meet the department's standards for cleanliness and food safety.

Two kosher bakeries were closed; both were re-opened very quickly.

At the time of the closures, Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR), spoke about the role of COR in maintaining the cleanliness of facilities under its supervision.

Rabbi Levin told The CJN that until that time, the organization operated under the assumption that food establishments had to fulfil all public health requirements and were inspected on a regular basis to ensure compliance with the requirements.

Kashrut inspection visits are conducted with varying frequency, depending on what foods are involved.

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth recently spoke to The CJN about an expanded policy at the Kashruth Council.

He said the mashgichim who inspect the premises are mainly rabbis and are not trained as health inspectors. Rather, they are trained to check for proper ingredients and procedures for kashrut.

"Because of health concerns, the Kashruth Council decided it must take a proactive stand in this serious matter," he said.

Following the closing of the two bakeries, a directive was sent to all COR bakeries, restaurants, caterers and other food services expressing the seriousness of disregard for health standards.

The directive stated that kashrut supervision would be revoked to all COR units that received health condemnations and the unit's file would be sent to the Kashruth Council board to review the matter and to decide whether kashrut supervision should be reinstated or other steps deemed appropriate should be taken.

Rabbi Kerzner said that "our expertise is in the field of halachic standards of kashruth; nevertheless, we feel strongly that any violation of the health department's standards would be halachically wrong and will bring into disrepute our supervision."

He noted that all establishments under COR supervision were directed to review their health-related policies, and zero tolerance would be applied to all supervised units.

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner

Mashgichim have been directed to report all situations that could be a health problem, he added.

He emphasized that establishments reopened after closure for non-compliance with health standards would be seriously considered by the Kashruth Council as to whether supervision should be reinstated.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Narayever shul revitalizes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Traditionally, as Jewish communities change and move, so do their institutions and organizations. Shuls, especially, have a long history of being abandoned when their members leave the area.

Then there is Toronto's Narayever shul, officially The First Narayever Congregation, a small shul on Brunswick Avenue, just north of Harbord Street.

(The term "First" came, shul legend says, because a group of Galicianers immigrating to North America split, one group going to New York and the other coming here. When the New York group decided to found a congregation, according to shul member and York sociology professor Stuart Schoenfeld, the Toronto ones quickly did it first. Hence – The First Narayever.)

When the congregation dwindled in the 1970s, a group of trend-reversing newcomers to downtown life took over the congregation, revitalized it, and changed it from Orthodox to traditional egalitarian.

While the building is quite small, the simple furnishings, carved Aron Kodesh and light walls give it an understated elegance.

Shul membership is some 500 adults (men and women are counted separately), many of whom are academics and professional people.

Members are often attracted by the traditional egalitarian philosophy of the shul, which recently-hired spiritual leader Rabbi Edward Elkin defines as worship from an Orthodox siddur, using the most traditional synagogue practice, and strict adherence to kashrut.

Traditional, egalitarian philosophy attracts new members

The only difference from an Orthodox synagogue, Rabbi Elkin said, is that there is "full participation by women in the liturgy, mixed seating and some modified prayers, such as referring to the matriarchs along with the patriarchs."

Shul spokesperson Frances Enchin and Rabbi Elkin spoke to The CJN in what in the old days was the kiddush room of the synagogue.

"We are on the verge of renovations," Enchin said enthusiastically. "We want to improve the downstairs, make the building wheelchair accessible, extend the sanctuary about 16 feet, and generally make it more up to date, while maintaining the family feeling and warmth."

These changes are needed because of the growth of the congregation, including the number of children, children's programs, youth groups, adult education and social action programs, and the increasing numbers of people coming to Shabbat services.

Rabbi Elkin himself is an interesting blend of the traditional and non-traditional. Although he grew up in a traditional shul, he chose to attend Hebrew Union College, the rabbinical seminary of the Reform movement, "for ideological reasons, many of which are still valid."

He has come to believe, however, that "either labels have become less important to me, or I personally don't like to be labelled."

His principal objection to the more traditional streams of Judaism revolves around the position of women, Rabbi Elkin said.

The fact that we were all created in God's image, he said, "implies the need for there to be certain changes in traditional practice. This is of primary importance in the early 21st century."

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Narayever shul revitalizes

He believes very strongly, he said, in the "inclusion of those people often excluded from the centre of Jewish institutional life." This not only refers to women, he stressed, but includes those of different sexual orientation, or the mentally or physically challenged.

"That's just right," he said.

The goal, he said, is for "every Jew to grow as a Jew. I want every member to feel that they are included, that they can grow from where they are and move on in their individual Jewish path."

Someone with a yeshiva background, for instance, may need insight into the importance of social action, while others are taking their first steps into a synagogue.

"They are not sure if they belong. They think that everyone else knows what's what."

The rabbi's goal, he said with a grin, is "to make the uncomfortable feel comfortable, and the comfortable uncomfortable."

The shul sees the High Holy Days as a way of opening doors to the community, Enchin said. "We get over 1,000 people – some whose only connection [to Judaism] is the High Holy Day services – to our programs at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre."

The services there are warm and open, she said. "We try to give a sense of who we are."

For the second year, the services will be led by Rabbi David Weiss, who is well known in Toronto for his work at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, the National Havurah Committee, the New Israel Fund and Peace Now.

There will also be High Holy Day services at the Narayever itself.

For more information about the shul, call 416-927-0546.

Museum offers children a taste of Jewish history and culture

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

There are numerous fun-filled activities and workshops for children three to 11 years old at My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum, at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

The 2,500-square-foot museum offers children a fun way to learn about Jewish history and holidays, customs and traditions, music and dance, heroes and folklore, Israel, Hebrew, and much more.

One entertaining hands-on activity is the Windows on Our World, a miniature city that – with the press of a button – accesses videotaped messages from a host of celebrities including Mayor Mel Lastman, Ed Mirvish, Luba Goy, Judy and David and Sharon, Lois & Bram.

The key word at the museum is participate. You are encouraged to roll up your sleeves and be a participant in a variety of centres.

In the Art of Words area, learn about the Hebrew language and Jewish history by building Hebrew sentences on a magnetic board, writing letters and creating tracings.

At the Routes and Roots exhibit, explore the stories of Jewish people in Canada. The centre gives a glimpse of how immigrants came to Canada. Users can pretend they are packing for the move and can create their own family tree.

Good deeds is the theme of the People Helping People exhibit. There is a mini-hospital where children can put on a hospital uniform and assist patients with an array of medical equipment. Or perform a mitzvah by making a refuah shlemah (get well card) for a patient who is ill.

Climb into a plane, ride a tractor on a kibbutz, plant trees, drive a camel in the desert or visit the Kotel and write down a message – all in the exhibit titled This is Your Land.

The museum's programs, available to individuals and groups from schools and camps, are hosted by dynamic and experienced guides.

Yair Ron: Perseverance

Yair Ron was injured at age 33, ironically, just after the Yom Kippur War had ended. His patrol encountered a Syrian ambush and they opened fire. One bullet hit Yair. One bullet that entered his abdomen and destroyed as much as it could. One small bullet that left him paralyzed and confined to a wheelchair, changing his life forever.

With the devotion of his family and friends, who never allowed him to give up, Yair overcame months of excruciating pain and depression.

Beit Halochem was the biggest help in allowing Yair to return to normal life. Rehabilitation meant being given a new chance. Beit Halochem helped him learn to do everything again, managing as independently as he could.

"The truth is that it is possible to live and to be happy, but it is impossible to free yourself from your disability. It is constantly with you every place and every minute. Thanks to Beit Halochem I have a place where I can belong and feel most comfortable."

Posluns loves to entertain

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When Dora Posluns says she is slowing down, she is only speaking relatively.

Posluns, who refuses to divulge her age ("I'm a senior. That's enough"), spends her time "making seniors happy." And she is very good at it.

A resident of the B'nai Brith apartment buildings on Bathurst Street near Sheppard Avenue, Posluns organizes entertainment there, as well as at the Baycrest Centre, Lincoln Place, and wherever else she is asked.

She arranges concerts, holiday parties, and Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut programs. She herself sings, writes poems, and tells jokes.

Dora Posluns

It all started when, a Holocaust survivor who came to Canada with her husband Wolf, in the early 1950s, she went to a mothers' and babies camp in Barrie.

"Everyone just sort of sat around," she said. "I asked why there wasn't any kind of entertainment, and they said if I wanted something, I should do it. So I did."

Posluns, who as a child had sung and recited poems on the stage of her school, needed no prodding. "I took down the curtains and made costumes out of them. I made a pretend Jewish wedding."

She encouraged everyone to join in the singing and dancing, and "we had a lovely evening."

So successful was it that she was invited back every year to arrange more entertainment, even when the camp moved to Parry Sound.

The family, which eventually included daughter Elaine and sons Carl and Jeff, moved to Rockford Road in North York, where they lived until shortly after Posluns' husband died.

When that happened, she says with simple dignity, "I didn't laugh or sing."

Unable to bear living in the family home, she moved to the B'nai Brith apartment some 17 years ago. And she hasn't looked back.

For a time, she put on a program every week for residents of the building. While she no longer does such a regular schedule there, she arranges entertainments from time to time, as well as holiday programs.

But that is not all. She has sung as a soloist in the choir of the Creative Living Centre as it moved from Council House to Hove Street and then to the Bernard Betel Centre.

She has organized programs at the Wagman Centre, and plays, musical shows and fashion shows at Good Fellowship Lodge in Barrie.

"When I sing," she says, "the people sing with me. Even people who have forgotten how to speak Yiddish, sing along with Rozinkes mit mandlen."

Posluns knows and can perform in five languages – English, Yiddish, Russian, Polish and Hebrew. "I know German too," she says abruptly, "but I am not so proud of it."

She is not always the only performer, but persuades professional entertainers to appear with her. The trick is that she is unable to offer a fee. "It's hard to get people to appear for free," she says.

Posluns herself receives no payment and she does not charge the audiences. While this may mean that there are no refreshments (unless someone donates them), and she spends a lot of time preparing material herself, she feels she is doing something very important.

Regrets? The only one, she says, is that when Hitler took power, she had to leave school. "I would have liked to go on," she muses. But, she acknowledges, "HaShem let me live, and I have lots of nachas from my children."

Although she uses a walker, she is not quitting. "I live to do mitzvahs for elderly people sitting looking at the four walls. As long as someone stands me up, I have material to perform."

One-stop Shopping at Mount Sinai Obstetrics

With the recent consolidation of the women's and infant's health services at Mount Sinai Hospital and the Toronto General Hospital division of the University Health Network, Mount Sinai has one of the largest centres of its kind in North America, says the associate chief of obstetrics and gynecology at Mount Sinai.

This move brings together scientists and clinicians in a meaningful working relationship, said Dr. Ronald Livingstone, former chief of obstetrics and gynecology at Toronto General.

The number of births is expected to double in the coming year to more than 7,000, and the number of outpatient visits will double to almost 114,000, said Theodore Freedman, hospital president and CEO.

"Our capacity for helping women with simple or complex issues in health care has not only increased in size, it has also expanded in depth with the addition of the talented staff from the University Health Network," he said.

To accommodate the increase in patient volumes, two new floors will be built on top of the west wing of the hospital. During the three years it takes for the floors to be completed, all outpatient services will be relocated to a newly designed centre at the Ontario Power Generation building on University Avenue.

All aspects of related health care such as fertility, family planning, prenatal and-menopause will be located in this new 50,000 square foot custom-built, ambulatory care centre, said Livingstone. "Women who would have had to walk corridors and take elevators to see doctors and take various tests, now have one-stop shopping," he said.

Included at the new site is low risk obstetrics and gynecology clinics; maternal infant programs; obstetrical and gynecological ultrasounds; a prenatal diagnosis unit and medical genetics; reproductive biology and a Toronto Cord Blood program; and urogynaecology.

"The consolidation is an interesting combination of cultures and traditions – Mount Sinai and Toronto General – which have existed for so long," said Livingstone.

Dr. Knox Ritchie, obstetrician and gynacologist-in-chief, said "our links with the University of Toronto and the hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute will also enhance the research and educational opportunities in this program.

"Women can expect exciting new developments from this program in the very new future," he said.

Sandler urges communication and understanding

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The city is blessed with a strong, vibrant Jewish community says Alan Sandler, president of UJA FEDERATION.

"With all our diversities, we have been able to build and develop strong institutions, and we have never reached a point where we have lost a discussion with anyone," he says.

Our challenge, says Sandler, who is in the second year of a two-year term, is to continue to work together and not necessarily accept, but see and appreciate one another's point of view.

"So far, we have been successful in keeping our lines of communication open, but we must continue to listen to one another. No one group should turn around and say, 'We're the only one.'"

The city's strong youth contingent is due largely to the fact that young adults feel they have a future here, he says. "Native Torontonians feel they can stay, and others are drawn because of economic opportunities and the city's vibrant Jewish life.

"The day schools and supplemental Hebrew schools offer something for everyone and allow for a lot of diversity. That is a big drawing card for young couples."

The federation's biggest issue at the moment is dealing with the community's enormous increase in population, says Sandler. "Currently, we are the fourth or fifth largest Jewish community in North America, and about 45,000 or 50,000 Jews live north of Steeles. We foresee that within five years, more Jewish people – mainly between the ages of 40 and 45 – will live in that area than in Montreal."

To that end, the federation recently launched Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), a plan to address the needs of both the Toronto community and the community in York Region.

A 50-acre lot has been purchased in Richmond Hill designating York Region as the northernmost of the three "campuses" in the Toronto area; the other two are downtown, around the Bloor JCC, and at the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue.

The plan includes renovating the Bloor JCC in order to better serve the downtown Jewish population, and building the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the corner of Harbord and Huron streets, for University of Toronto Jewish students.

"The southern campus south of St. Clair Avenue is blossoming. Almost 10,000 people attend programs at the JCC, and some of the downtown congregations have had to hold services in bigger halls," says Sandler.

Within the northern campus, he says, the community needs schools, a community centre, facilities for various agencies, and subsidized housing. "This all needs to be done within the next five to seven years. We cannot service [all the people expected in the region] within the current infrastructure."

The central campus revolving around the BJC and Lipa Green Building is also vibrant, says Sandler, "but we cannot rest; we must remain committed. We need more and more volunteers to keep the current programs running, and to ensure that the BJC will remain a place where everyone can mix."

Priorities, he says, after providing for food and shelter, include assisting the immigrant population, battered families, the elderly and Holocaust survivors.

"The community also needs to concentrate on education and Jewish culture, and family programming," he says. "Then we have to look towards helping Israel and the Jews in the former Soviet Union."

Core services are being met by the central UJA FEDERATION campaign, says Sandler, "and most people accept our allocations.

"One of the goals of JTT is to partner major donor families with institutions. That is done by starting a dialogue between our board of governors and the donor families. We establish where are needs are, and where these families want their money to go. A match is then made."

Looking back on his first year in office, Sandler says that "it's been great. Everything has been positive. Every crisis we've encountered has been because of the community's growth. It is a challenge that I am thoroughly enjoying. It is a generous, committed community, and families have always come forward to help out."

Downtown a scene of vital Jewish life

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As the Jewish population in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) continues to expand north, a quieter, more modest level of growth is being registered in the city's southern reaches as well.

Home to the Jewish community of Toronto in its early years, the downtown area is seeing a remarkable revitalization of Jewish life as newcomers and young couples move south to be near the city's vibrant business and cultural life.

Toronto is one of the few downtowns in North America with a steadily increasing Jewish population. Anywhere from 15,000 to 25,000 Jews now live "downtown," depending on where demographers and sociologists draw the community's northern boundary.

Downtown a scene of vital Jewish life

And, as night follows day, where there are Jews there are Jewish organizations, with at least 23 at last count popping up to bring together like-minded Jews in religious, social, educational, cultural and recreational settings.

Currently, the 23 organizations are affiliated with the Downtown Jewish Community Council (DJCC), an umbrella organization established in 1993 when the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) was in danger of going bankrupt. Its initial members included the JCC's Bloor branch, the First Narayever Congregation, the Downtown Jewish Community School and the Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

In 1993, its goal was to exchange information and provide mutual support, said Bill Emery, the Bloor Jewish Community Centre's long-serving executive-director. Since then, the DJCC has expanded its mandate to include nurturing and supporting grass roots groups and linking them to the larger community in the north.

The DJCC has set five goals for itself:

- to promote Jewish institutions and organizations in the downtown area;
- to encourage Jewish education;
- to unify the downtown community;
- to promote outreach to the unaffiliated;
- to promote community activities and holiday celebrations.

Meeting six to eight times a year in the Bloor JCC's boardroom, the DJCC is also developing a long-range planning function, Emery said. On the agenda is a "downtown Jewish community planning day in which we'll set out the objectives for what we'd like to see downtown," he said. "It will help formulate a plan to meet the needs of this community, from facilities to programs."

The DJCC also participates in the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, the UJA Federation project that plans for the broader community's future needs.

At the centre of the downtown community and its plans for the future is the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, the facility that hosts the DJCC and provides facilities for programming and meetings for many of the DJCC's constituent groups.

For many years in the 1980s and early '90s, the Bloor JCC was the subject of speculation that it would be sold to pay off the JCC's debts. However, the facility survived the JCC's bankruptcy scare in the mid-1990s and has gone on to become the focal point of downtown community life. It houses the Downtown Jewish Community School, the Downtown Jewish Day School and JF&CS. It provides space for High Holiday services for the First Narayever Congregation, it's home to the Toronto Jewish Film Society, and it is the scene of numerous cultural and arts events and seniors programs.

Council wants to do long-term planning

Under the auspices of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow project, the Bloor JCC has been slated for a major renovation and expansion, beginning this fall. A joint program of the Centre and the UJA Federation, the renovation will see the Bloor JCC become the Nadal Jewish Community Centre, named for philanthropist Miles Nadal. The revamped facility will include the 300-seat Green Family Cultural Centre, a project of Al Green, David Y. Green and their families.

As part of the first phase of renovation, four retailers will open for business on the Bloor side of the building, while other changes include two new aerobics studios, the addition of new administrative offices and an overall upgrading of the facility. A second phase of construction will include a new conference centre/computer room, a new chapel/Jewish resource room and several program rooms.

The Downtown Jewish Community Council's member organizations include:

Ashkenaz; Beach Hebrew Institute; Bloor JCC; BBYO – Downtown Chapter Koach; Congregation Anshei Kiev; Congregation Anshei Minsk; Congregation Shaarei Tzedec; Congregation Keshet Shalom; Congregation Shir Libeynu; Davisville Village Chaverim; Downtown Reform Minyan; Downtown Jewish Community School; Downtown Jewish Day School; Danforth Jewish Circle; The First Narayever Congregation; Habayit Shelanu Seniors Residences; Hillel Children's Workshop; Jewish Students Union; JF&CS; the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre/Beit Yosef Congregation; Shalom Group; UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; West End Jewish Community Association.

Shadchan service for Orthodox singles

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the greatest mitzvot, according to Jewish tradition, is to arrange marriages.

As Rebbetzen Jenni Ochs describes it, "to make a shidduch is to create a world."

This is not just an empty sentiment for Ochs. She and the other Orthodox rebbetzens in the GTA, together with a coterie of concerned Orthodox women, have established Sasson V'Simcha, an introduction service for observant (shomer Shabbat) singles.

"To make a shidduch is to create a world"

It all started with a phone call to Ochs from a recently married woman. "She was new in town, and she was worried that there were so many single friends," Ochs remembered.

It struck a chord in Ochs, whose husband, Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, is spiritual leader of Torath Emeth congregation. She frequently got requests for help in finding a suitable mate, as did other rebbetzens.

Sasson V'Simcha (the name, translated as mirth and joy, is part of the Sheva Brachot, the seven blessings recited at weddings and for seven days afterwards) began somewhat informally between the rabbitzens of the city's Orthodox synagogues.

So well-received was the effort, that it quickly expanded to include volunteers from every Orthodox shul, Ochs said, from modern Orthodox to the most haredi.

The volunteers get no remuneration and are very dedicated said Ochs and member Leah Aryeh. Participants meet every week, as well as take part in a public meeting once every six weeks or so.

When people contact the organization, they are asked to fill out a profile form, which is entered into a computer database. Besides questions related to age, education, and marital history, much of the form is specifically aimed at their clientele.

This includes questions about religious background ranging from "frum from birth," baal tshuva, modern orthodox or yeshiva with or without secular education. Questions about shul attendance and religious study are also included.

Applicants' religious standards

Applicants are also asked how they feel about such matters as women covering their hair or wearing pants, men wearing hats, religious learning, and even smoking.

Four times a week, the volunteers meet at the group's Bathurst Street office to discuss the men and women who have applied, and to try to match them up. As well, there is an open meeting at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, where the volunteers, or the people themselves, come to compare notes, and discuss potential matches.

Sasson v'Simcha also networks with resources in some cities in the United States, including Baltimore, Chicago, Lakewood and New York. They also have informal contacts in other places, so if, for instance, one of their candidates is going to a different city, someone in the organization may know someone who is a possible match.

When the volunteers have decided on a potential match, and both parties agree to meet, the man is given the girl's name and phone number, and the rest is up to them.

The volunteers, however, are ready to give advice if it is wanted. "We encourage people to be realistic, and to decide what is really important to them," said Ochs.

Absolute confidentiality is assured, Ochs stressed.

Aryeh said that, contrary to what many think, the Orthodox don't necessarily have an easy time finding a mate. This is especially true, she said, for those in their early thirties and beyond, and in some places for the very young, recent graduates of seminaries and yeshivot.

For more information, to register at Sasson V'Simcha, or to help with their work, call 416-256-4497, or write 3101 Bathurst St., Suite 404, Toronto, M6A 2A6.

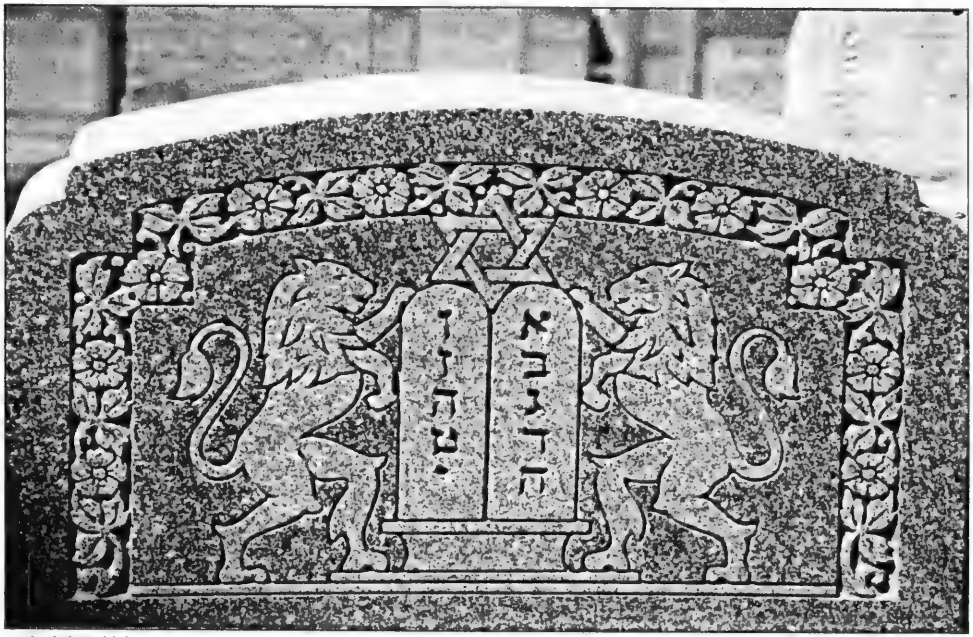
Poor treated with dignity at Pardes Shalom Cemetery

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN



Pardes Shalom, an 89-acre Jewish cemetery on the northern fringe of the Greater Toronto Area, is the largest Jewish cemetery in Ontario, and receives about one-third of the city's Jewish dead – about 550 burials annually.

Situated on the east side of Dufferin Street north of Major Mackenzie Drive, the cemetery, whose name means orchard of peace, still has about 18,000 unallocated burial plots.

The cemetery is owned by Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (THMP), an independent corporation that acts in trust for the community though the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto.

Cemetery land assured at THMP

"Our purpose is to ensure that we have enough cemetery land for... Toronto's Jewish community, regardless of whether they belong to an organization or not, and that the land is available at a reasonable cost," says Stephen Speisman, executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park.

"We are certainly not short of cemetery land in the THMP jurisdiction," says Speisman, who is also director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and author of The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937.

In addition to the present facility, THMP has acquired 200 acres some two kilometres north of the current site, but this should not be needed for about 10 years.

Speisman says there are generally two methods by which a person may acquire an interment right in most of the 11 Jewish cemeteries in the Toronto area. One must either belong to one of the various organizations that maintain sections in the cemeteries, or find an organization that will sell interment rights to a non-member.

While more than 50 Jewish organizations have established a patchwork of sections on Pardes Shalom's neatly landscaped grounds, the cemetery is unique in Toronto because it also maintains large "community section" areas in which Jews may be buried without the necessity of belonging to, or making arrangements with, a third-party organization.

"People who are not affiliated with any organization can buy interment rights for the same price as an organization," Speisman says. "The current price is $1,284, and that includes GST. That's for a single plot."

Individuals may give up their interment rights

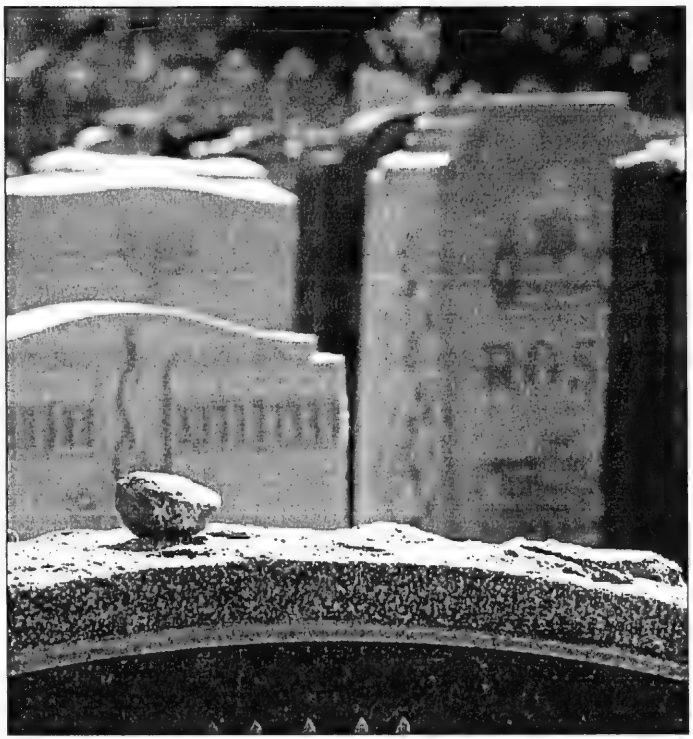
The various mutual benefit societies, synagogues, landsmanschaft and benevolent organizations with sections at Pardes Shalom are bound by stringent THMP by-laws that prohibit the burial of non-Jews, the transfer of interment rights beyond an original purchaser, and the making of profit on the sale of a burial right.

"If an individual wishes to give up their interment rights, they give back their plot to us, and we give them a refund," Speisman says. The land, he explains, remains at all times the property of the corporation; only the interment right is available for purchase.

When the THMP sells a large number of interment rights to an organization, the purchaser pays 30 percent down and the rest in 10 equal instalments over five years. Jewish law stipulates that no interest be charged on the transaction.

Speisman says the prevailing practice in Jewish cemeteries at present, that Jews and non-Jews are not buried together in the same cemetery, is also the policy at THMP.

For someone born as a non-Jew to be buried at Pardes Shalom, "there must be a conversion," Speisman says. "If there is a conversion by any Jewish denomination, we will recognize it. We don't make a judgment."



Conversely, Jews who convert to Christianity will not be permitted to make Pardes Shalom their final resting place, a policy that "has the support of the Vaad Harabanim and the Toronto Board of Rabbis."

No one denied a burial due to poverty

Last year, in a high-profile case, the funeral procession of a Jewish-born Christian minister who had been active in Jews for Jesus, was barred at the cemetery gates. The burial eventually took place in a non-denominational cemetery.

No one, however, is denied burial at Pardes Shalom because of poverty. "If a family cannot afford to pay for a burial, we take care of it – it's our responsibility to do that," Speisman says.

Several years after such a burial, if no monument has been placed on the grave, THMP approaches the family to determine their intentions. If the family cannot afford a monument, THMP will place a flat granite marker on the grave. "That's our policy – every grave is marked," Speisman says.

Each major Jewish denomination maintains sections in the cemetery, as do secular organizations such as the Chaverim Society.

"The whole gamut of ideologies are represented," Speisman says.

The community's cemeteries

Pardes Sholom is the newest of Toronto's 11 Jewish cemeteries. The others are:

- Bathurst Lawn: Bathurst just south of Steeles;
- Beth Tzedec: Bathurst just north of Finch;
- Brimley Road (Holy Blossom Temple): Brimley south of Eglinton;
- Dawes Road: St. Clair and Victoria Park;
- Jones Avenue: Jones south of Dundas;
- Lambton: Royal York and Eglinton;
- McCowan Road: McCowan north of Danforth;
- Mount Sinai: Wilson east of Keele;
- Pape: Pape and Gerrard – this is the oldest Jewish cemetery in Toronto. While it belongs to Holy Blossom, there are no longer burials here.
- Roselawn: Roselawn east of Bathurst.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Young people desensitized to violence, says Gardner

Gardner noted that the emergence of visible minorities and religious groups has led to racial attacks and harassment. "That took away some attention that might have gone to Jews," he pointed out.

Young people, he said, are increasingly "desensitized" to violence. In the media, he said, "they see war all the time, and it appears that people don't suffer." There are videos that teach kids how to kill, he said.

Plenty of Jewish youngsters, he said, are involved in drugs. "Many of them have died because of that indulgence." Not as many, proportionately, are involved in criminal activity, however.

What about the schools? Few who attended the parents' meeting after the stabbing in the parking lot of CHAT during a school dance will forget the fear and resentment of the parents, who felt that the event signalled that it was no longer even safe to send a child to a Jewish school.

Much of the rhetoric centred around the swiss army knives that many youngsters receive as bar mitzvah gifts. There were demands for these knives to be banned from the school, for zero tolerance policies, for increased security, for the accused to be banned from the school.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, empathizes with those concerns. Nevertheless, like Gardner, Epstein says Toronto is a safe place to go to school.

Violence in Jewish schools rare

"One of the main reasons that there was so much attention paid to the incident is that it is indeed so rare. The police admitted that they never have to come to the Jewish schools."

Nevertheless, he said, the board supports schools that have instituted programs to deal with such problems as bullying, violence and drug abuse. Occasionally the board itself runs seminars or workshops on issues. It also encourages schools to contact other institutions that have dealt with similar problems.

Seymour Epstein

Zero tolerance is not the answer, he said, because it takes away the option of choice from the institution.

As for security systems, "you can't turn schools into prisons," he asserted.

Party loyalty and conscience

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Last week, the Canada Family Action Coalition defended its efforts to promote Christian-centric Canadian Alliance (CA) candidates by arguing that Jewish and Sikh communities also orchestrate efforts to elect members of their religions.

Even Stockwell Day singled out former Montreal MP Sheila Finestone as an example of the Jewish community joining forces to get a member of their religion into Parliament.

Day's assertion was grossly inaccurate in at least two ways. First, many people will recall that when Finestone first ran, and successfully at that, she was mightily challenged by another prominent Jew, Sharon Wolfe, who subsequently, went on to become a key advisor to Brian Mulroney.

Second, it is completely false to suggest there was or is a "Jewish agenda" on governmental issues in the same manner that there is, at least on the part of the evangelical Christian right, a "Christian agenda" on issues such as abortion, sexual orientation and the like.

Who does an MP answer to: his party constituents or his co-religionists?

The suggestion that there is an inherent representational link between a faith community and a member of Parliament who happens to share that community's faith is an important issue worthy of exploration.

When he served as solicitor general back in the early 1980s, Robert Kaplan was taken to task in certain quarters of "his" Jewish community because of his perceived weak response regarding the prosecution of alleged Nazi war criminals. Some felt Kaplan had pressed for action on that file as much as he could.

But most believed he was a "vendu" – a colloquial Quebec expression for someone who has "sold-out."

The harshness (and legitimacy) of the criticism aside, no one ever suggested that Kaplan advanced a Jewish agenda at the expense of the policies of the government of which he was a member.

The real question, therefore, may be: To what extent should party loyalty impinge on a politician's personal beliefs or religious convictions?

Is it ever reasonable – even appropriate – for a politician to say, "I must oppose my party."

Stay tuned faithful readers. Next week we'll seek to answer this question by looking at a more recent case study.

and we try to keep everybody comfortable," said Murray Grafstein, 66, a synagogue executive and former president. (He is related to Senator Gerry Grafstein.)

Murray's parents started a textile business in Peterborough, the Uptown Silk Company, which he is now winding up.

Beth Israel is not affiliated officially with any stream of Judaism, although it was once with the United Synagogues, Gafstein said.

The kitchen of Beth Israel is strictly kosher, he added.

"Some of the Jews here are not as conversant with davening in the traditional style but they are keenly interested in Judaism. Things have changed a lot. My children went to Hebrew school several times a week. Now the students just go once a week. There are so many other things for kids to do."

The city lies in Kawartha cottage country, dotted with lakes, only 75 miles from Toronto. "We can go anywhere we want in five minutes, that's one of the attractions of living here," said Gillman, whose husband, Larry, works for Quaker Oats.

The late Rabbi A.B. Baab, who died three years ago, was the spiritual leader of the community for many years.

'Things have changed a lot'

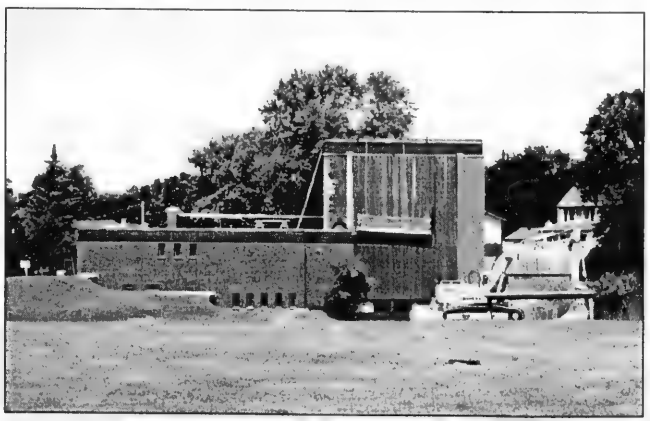
In 1964, at the time the new Beth Israel was opened, the rabbi said Peterborough's first Jew was L. Kert, a shoemaker, who arrived in 1881, followed by a Mr. Lister and J. Ripstein.

Among the pioneering Jewish families were the Lows, the Florences, the Swartzes, the Cohens, the Elkins, the Finebergs, the Blacks, the Sukloffs, the Zacks, and the Cherneys, among others.

By 1951, according to the census, there were 232 Jews in a total population of 28,272.

From 1939 to 1964, the Beth Israel Synagogue was located on Reid Avenue in a former Methodist Sunday School. Before that it was on Aylmer Street in a house owned by the late Abraham Swartz and remodelled into a synagogue.

At that time, a committee, convened by Mrs. B. Chesler, raised the money to buy it.



Renovation work continues at Beth Israel Synagogue.

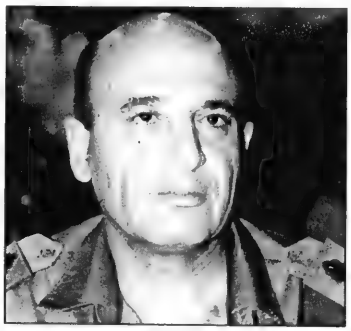
Three IDF soldiers killed by blunders of elite unit

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Friendly fire by members of IDF's Duvdevan unit is being blamed for the deaths of three Israeli soldiers killed after a clash with the "most wanted" Hamas terrorist in the West Bank, Mahmoud Abu Hanud.

Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz, who appointed a commission of inquiry to investigate the incident, described it as a "serious operational hitch" deriving from "inaccurate placement [of the soldiers], or inaccurate identification or inaccurate fire." He promised that the events would be thoroughly investigated.

The soldiers killed were Staff Sgt. Niv Ya'akobi, 20, from Tel Aviv, Staff Sgt. Liron Sharvit, 20, from Beit Hashmonai and Staff Sgt. Roey Even-Filsteiner, 21, from Hod Hasharon. Sgt. Avi Asaf is recovering from his wounds in Tel Hashomer Hospital.



Shaul Mofaz

Abu Hanud, the object of the operation, was wounded lightly and escaped to Nablus, where he gave himself up to the Palestinian security forces and was hospitalized. Hanud is believed responsible for two suicide bombings in Jerusalem in 1997 that claimed 21 lives. A second terrorist on the scene surrendered to the IDF.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who is also defence minister, said that "if it turns out that the fighters were hit by their comrades, that is the gravest and most painful operational hitch imaginable." He added that Abu Hanud's arrest by the Palestinian Authority will scuttle wide-scale terrorist attacks he had planned.

A major question to be addressed by the investigation is whether the reason for the errors lay in flawed advance planning or in substandard execution by the soldiers. If the latter, measures may be taken against officers in the unit.

The general staff does not usually remove field-level commanders for operational mishaps, but the gravity of the failure in this case may require a departure from that policy.

Israel digs for solutions to water crisis

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

It has been a long, hot summer in Israel, and the country's scarce water supplies are being squeezed past their limits.

After three years of drought, Israeli water authorities have watched this summer in trepidation as the country's three main water sources – the Sea of Galilee, the coastal aquifer and mountain aquifer – have been rapidly sucked below danger levels.

With no alternative solutions in place, there was little they could do except to launch a big public campaign, showing Israelis how every extra toilet flush drains the Sea of Galilee, which has now dropped 13 centimetres below the red line of 213 metres below sea level.

Yet they know that the impact of publicity on water consumption habits is only a partial remedy, and solid solutions are needed to provide a long-term answer to an ongoing problem. So last month, the government pushed through a long-awaited comprehensive plan for a series of solutions, ranging from desalinization to importing water from nearby countries such as Turkey to recycling more sewage for agriculture and industry.

But it will still take time for these projects to come to life, and even if the plan is pushed through quickly, the first desalinization plant will probably not come on line for more than two years. In the interim, rain is of the essence.

"If in the coming winter we will have an average rainfall or a dry year, we will be forced to cut the quotas of water for agriculture," said Shimon Tal, Israel's water commissioner.

"A rainy winter will allow us to get through the next year or two," he added. "However, over the next two years we are dependent on the mercy of heaven."

Those heavens have been far from merciful over the past decade. Even though rainfall was average in Israel last winter, the last three years have been very dry overall.

Over the past decade, there has only been one extremely rainy winter, in 1992. At the same time, 1 million immigrants came to Israel from former Soviet Union countries, adding additional strain on meagre resources.

As part of a peace deal with Jordan, Israel agreed to transfer 55 million cubic metres of water a year to its eastern neighbour, and water is on the agenda of the Israeli-Palestinian peace talks as well. Meanwhile, as Israel's standard of living has steadily climbed, water use has been steadily rising.

But although the signs of an imminent crisis were clear, the government only decided to implement solutions last month.

Part of the problem is that the agricultural industry is the biggest consumer of water in the country, and the agricultural lobby is one of the most powerful pressure groups in Israel.

Water for agricultural use is heavily subsidized – costing 55 percent less than water for consumers – and farmers have successfully thwarted any attempt to raise the prices. They warn that more expensive water would make their products more expensive on world markets, and could be the kiss of death to an industry that is already struggling.

"For years, the biggest mistake is that the water system in Israel has been run by the agricultural lobby, which has its own interests," said Yossi Inbar, deputy director general of Israel's Ministry of the Environment.

Inbar also blames the Finance Ministry for blocking approval of water programs over the years. The treasury, he said, did not worry about an imminent crisis since it calculates water projections and needs based on a multiyear rainfall average.

The Finance Ministry has argued that before building desalinization plants, which will end up raising the cost of water to all consumers, subsidies for farmers should be reduced.

"When you have a vital and scarce resource, and not only don't you sell it at a realistic price but subsidize it heavily to the biggest consumer, you intensify the shortage greatly," said Zohar Yinon, director of the water and sewage unit at the finance ministry's budget division.

Critics say the Finance Ministry was unrealistic in insisting on breaking the agricultural lobby. "It is a politically unlikely scenario," said one businessman involved in the water issue. "The Finance Ministry's argument is only correct if you ignore the social implications of abandoning hundreds of thousands of acres of land."

With the rapidly deteriorating situation, the future of Israeli agriculture may no longer rest in the hands of water subsidies, but rather with the rain clouds that Israelis hope will come their way this autumn.

"If we have another dry year," says Inbar of the Environment Ministry, "Israeli agriculture may not survive."

Ehud Barak aims to please secular voters

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak has announced a number of initiatives aimed at Israel's secular voters.

The initiatives, which are being viewed as an indication that Barak is pessimistic about the possibility of bringing any religious parties back into his weakened governing coalition, include allowing for the drafting of a constitution, creating civil marriages and abolishing the Ministry of Religious Affairs.

Barak announced the initiatives in a meeting with Labour party ministers last week.

"The national agenda has now changed: After the withdrawal from Lebanon and putting the economy on its feet, it is time to raise the flag of social issues," Barak told Israel Radio.

Barak said he had delegated three Cabinet ministers – Yossi Beilin, Shlomo Ben-Ami and Rabbi Michael Melchior – to draw up a position paper on a constitution.

He said he would continue simultaneously with efforts to make peace with Israel's neighbours.

Ehud Barak

Sources within Barak's One Israel bloc said Barak's move was tantamount to a "divorce" from the Shas party – which vehemently opposes the steps.

Barak publicly prodded the Likud party to support his measures. But Ariel Sharon, the leader of the main opposition party, said Barak's announcement reflected his government's panic – and predicted the measures would not pass.

The announcement is the latest in a series that appears to be aimed at winning favour with the Israeli public.

For example, Finance Minister Avraham Shochat recently announced a number of dramatic cuts in sales taxes on such items as household appliances and electronics.

Barak lost his parliamentary majority when three parties walked out of his governing coalition in protest against the Camp David summit, leaving his coalition with 42 members out of the 120-member Knesset.

The embattled prime minister has been trying to rebuild his coalition during the Knesset summer recess while simultaneously working to advance peace efforts with the Palestinians.

At the same time, however, speculation has intensified that Barak may have to face early elections if he is unable to cobble together a government or head off efforts to vote his coalition out of office.

Suicide bombings planned by local ring linked to Bin Laden

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Shin Bet security service has uncovered a terrorist ring established in the territories by the extremist Islamic organization headed by Osama Bin Laden, the elusive Afghanistan-based multimillionaire who is wanted by the United States for perpetrating a series of terrorist attacks against American nationals.

The members of the ring planned to carry out a series of attacks against Israeli targets, including suicide-bomb attacks inside Israel and the launching of anti-tank missiles at settlements in the territories.

Sources said that warnings about the terrorist groups' plan to perpetrate large-scale attacks in Israel, particularly in Jerusalem, remain valid, though there is no concrete information about any specific squad that is about to carry out such an attack.

The terrorist ring was discovered following the capture of its leader, Nabil Oukal, from the Jebalya refugee camp in the Gaza Strip. He had undergone training at camps sponsored by Bin Laden in Pakistan and Afghanistan, where he was instructed to set up a network that would perpetrate attacks against Israel.

Oukal recruited dozens of activists and was in contact with Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of the militant Hamas organization. Yassin apparently did not know that Oukal was also working for Bin Laden, and there is no reports of operational co-ordination between Bin Laden and Hamas.

Oukal also tried to recruit two members of the Islamic Movement in Israel, but they declined to join him.

Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) have arrested 11 members of the ring. The Shin Bet and the PA's preventive security units are still looking for caches of explosives, which the network had in its possession.

A senior security official said that two others in the ring had also been trained in Bin Laden camps abroad, acquiring extensive knowledge in the use of sophisticated sabotage methods.

The official said that Israeli authorities identified Bin Laden's intentions very late — his organization first made contact with activists in the territories three years ago.

The Shin Bet is concerned about the phenomenon of dozens of Palestinians going to Pakistan for religious studies. They fear studies there may be fertile ground for recruiting students to join Islamic international terrorist organizations.

Last April, the Shin Bet arrested three Israeli Arabs from the Islamic Movement who were suspected of engaging in terrorist activity for Hamas. The head of that group, Maazen Mahzouma, received instructions from his brother Nabil, a Hamas man who lives in Damascus.

The group acquired a Kalashnikov rifle and hid it near Jenin, in the northern West Bank, to be picked up by another Hamas squad. They were arrested when they went to pick up weapons from a cache on the Egyptian border.

The senior security official said the three probably operated on their own and that the leaders of the Islamic Movement were unaware of their activity.

Shin Bet is particularly concerned over the Syrian connection to the terrorist groups. The senior official said that "Syria is still a centre of terrorism. Headquarters of Hamas and Islamic Jihad are located there, and their personnel continue to initiate terrorist attacks, including very recently. This is not underground activity. It is done openly and Damascus turns a blind eye."

Hamas activists who were recently detained told their interrogators about instructions they had received directly from the organization's headquarters in Damascus, the senior official said.

Argentine Jews angry at missionaries

By NICOLAS PENCHASZADEH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — The three-day celebration in one of Buenos Aires' most popular parks two weeks ago was touted as an international festival of Jewish music and dance.

But, as Argentine Jewish leaders made perfectly clear, the event, attended by 30,000 people, was actually sponsored by "messianic Jews" who want to persuade Jews to accept Jesus.

Argentine Jewish leaders protested the event, which marked a rare appearance by messianic Jews in Argentina, where they are less visible than elsewhere in the world, such as in the United States and eastern Europe.

"These so-called messianic Jews who use Jewish symbols are actually a group of Christian missionaries who are very active in the United States, whose aim is to attract misinformed Jews to convert them," stated a news release issued by the AMIA Jewish Community Centre.

"We respect religious freedom, but we want to state that these self-proclaimed messianic Jews are not part of the Jewish community and their event does not receive the backing of any Jewish institution in the country."

The Argentine Jewish community protested the event, asking a judge to block the festival, but he refused to do so. The judge did, however, order event organizers to take down neon menorahs and a Star of David, but left the sign advertising the event.

Jewish leaders sent out e-mails and took out newspaper advertisements. Outside the stadium, flyers were posted and a truck with speakers informed possible attendees about the true nature of the event.

"Beware!!! Don't let yourself be fooled by these people who are financed by powerful groups in order to, convert you to Christianity. In 2,000 years, they haven't been able to do it by force, and now they try like this," read one of the flyers.

Jewish heritage sites promoted in Europe

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

An ancient mikvah in Sicily. The Jewish cemetery in Sarajevo. The oldest synagogue in Great Britain.

These are just a few of the hundreds of Jewish heritage sites in 16 European countries that will be open to the public Sept. 3 in a "European Day of Jewish Culture."

The scope of this year's initiative is a demonstration of a growing interest in European Jewish heritage and Jewish heritage sites that has developed markedly in the past decade.

Comment

From Spain to Switzerland, from Belgium to the Balkans, the aim of the event is to recognize Jewish heritage as an integral part of European cultural heritage and to promote tourism to sites of Jewish interest.

According to organizers, as many as 300 or more synagogues, cemeteries, ritual baths, medieval ghettos and Jewish museums will be on show.

Guided tours, exhibitions, concerts and other events are also planned – ranging from a Jewish book fair in Bologna to food-tastings of typical Jewish cuisine in a number of towns and cities. Special brochures, leaflets and other informational material will be distributed in a number of places.

"The Jewish community wants to promote awareness and stimulate interest in all aspects of its culture," said a representative of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities.

"They know that tolerance begins with curiosity in others, and that acquaintance and encounter help eliminate preconceptions, enabling dialogue among peoples."

For decades after World War II, Jews and non-Jews alike paid little attention to preserving or documenting Jewish sites that had survived both the destruction of the Holocaust and demographic shifts of Jewish populations.

The "Street of the Jews" in St. Malo, France

Many Jews wanted nothing to do with places that they believed were vestiges of a closed chapter of history. But since the late 1980s – and particularly since the fall of communism opened up Eastern and Central Europe to tourists and scholars – Jewish heritage has become increasingly recognized as a rich legacy for Europe as a whole and embraced as an important component of multicultural society.

"Jewish heritage in France is also the heritage of all the French people, just as the cathedrals of France also belong to France's Jews," France's culture minister told a conference on European Jewish heritage held in Paris last year.

Sites in nearly 40 towns and cities will be open in Italy, home to about 35,000 Jews. In Florence, Italy's culture minister will attend a ceremony kicking off restoration of the city's magnificent synagogue and Jewish museum.

In Britain, sites in London and eight other cities are on the list, putting a number of selected historic synagogues on public view for the first time.

Among the synagogues open to the public will be London's Bevis Marks Synagogue, the oldest in Britain, built in 1701.

Most sites on display are generally closed to public access, and many were abandoned for decades – or centuries.

Like Spanish ghettos that will be open for viewing, the medieval mikvah in Sicily, considered one of the finest in Europe, predates the expulsion of Jews from Spanish-ruled lands in 1492.

The Jewish cemetery in Sarajevo, founded in 1630, is undergoing restoration after being seriously damaged during the siege of Bosnia in the 1990s, when it was on the front line of fighting and used as an important artillery position by Bosnia Serbs.

The synagogue in Florence

In several countries, the government is serving as a sponsor, and the Council of Europe has included Jewish Culture Day as part of its campaign promoting "Europe, a Common Heritage."

France's Agency for the Development of Tourism of the Bas-Rhin, B'nai B'rith Europe, the European Council of Jewish Communities and the Red de Juderias de Espana, in Girona, Spain are co-ordinating the initiative, which will take place in Austria, Belgium, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, Spain, Switzerland and the United Kingdom.

The European Open Day is an expansion of an "Open Doors to Jewish Heritage" program initiated in the French region of Alsace in 1996.

Each year, the number of participating sites has grown. Last year, sites in five countries were included as an experimental step toward expanding the event to a Europewide event this year.

Jews tell Vatican: Pius IX doesn't merit sainthood

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VATICAN CITY — An umbrella Jewish group dealing with Jewish-Catholic relations has bluntly told the Vatican that Pius IX doesn't deserve to be a saint.

Pius IX, a 19th-century pope who became infamous for ordering the 1858 kidnap of Edgardo Mortara, a Jewish boy who had been forcibly baptized as a baby, will be beatified by Pope John Paul II on Sept. 3 – the last step before sainthood.

The protest came in a letter last Wednesday from Seymour Reich, chair of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations to Archbishop Jose Saraiva Martins.

Martins is chair of the Vatican's Congregation for the Causes of Saints.

"If saintliness is seen as the goodness, wisdom and courage to behave righteously and right wrongs regardless of when they occur, then Pius IX's conduct falls far short of saintliness," Reich wrote.

Perpetuated contempt

Acknowledging that "only the Church itself" had the right to determine who are its saints, Reich nonetheless wrote: "But when the issue of sainthood embodies matters of major Jewish concern, we believe the Jewish community has an obligation to voice its reaction."

He called Pius IX "the pope who perpetuated centuries-old church contempt and hatred for Jews" and branded the kidnap of Mortara an "assault on Judaism and parenthood."

The Reich letter was the latest in a series of protests from Jews in Italy, Israel and elsewhere over the beatification of Pius IX, who reigned from 1846 to 1878 and was the last pope to confine Jews to the ghetto.

There is virtually no chance that beatification plans will be shelved. But Reich's letter is notable in that IJCIC is the Vatican's official Jewish partner in interreligious dialogue.

The IJCIC consists of the American Jewish Committee, the ADL, B'nai B'rith, the World Jewish Congress and the Israel Jewish Council on Interreligious Relations, as well as representatives of Orthodox, Reform and Conservative Jewry.

Pius IX will be beatified in a joint ceremony in which Pope John XXIII will also be set on the road to sainthood.

John XXIII, who died in 1963, was a genuinely beloved figure who modernized the Catholic church, helped save Jews during World War II and opened the way to Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

Catholics and non-Catholics alike are greeting his beatification with joy.

August 23

• There's not yet enough common ground between Israel and the Palestinians to hold another summit, said Israel's chief negotiator at the recent Camp David meetings, Shlomo Ben-Ami.

August 24

• An American military officer found in Israel after going absent without leave for two weeks from his Texas base is voluntarily returning to the United States. Lt.-Col. Jeremiah Mattysse said he did not pass any military information to the Jewish state.

August 25

• Barak yesterday took his first concrete step toward establishing a national unity government by calling on the Likud to join his government within a few weeks if the peace process with the Palestinians fails.

Help your child cope with back-to-school stress

By ELLEN FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hectic schedules can cause children stress that leads to emotional and mental difficulties. With back-to-school time approaching, students' stress levels are rising and parents should know the warning symptoms.

Symptoms of Stress

Symptoms of stress appear in three different ways: emotionally, socially or physically. Symptoms differ in different age groups.

Elementary school children may show physical signs such as sleeping problems, changes in eating habits, head and stomach aches, teeth grinding, bed wetting and twirling and pulling their own hair, and they may become accident prone. Emotional signs could include difficulty concentrating, anxiety and nervousness, increased irritability, lowered tolerance for frustration, and increased moodiness and tearfulness. Withdrawing from previous interests and avoiding social activities are true reflections of stress. Grade school children also may drastically change the way they play and talk with others.

Middle-school students demonstrate stress with frequent illnesses, accidents and headaches. They experience mood swings, persistent depression and anger, and are unwilling to discuss feelings. Social changes showing stress may include fighting with peers, shoplifting, smoking, changing friends, lack of interest in participating in extra-curricular activities and, potentially, drifting into drug and alcohol use.

Symptoms appear in three different ways

High-schoolers could lose or gain a significant amount of weight and establish a pattern of increased numbers of "sick days." Socially, they may drift into smoking, and drug and alcohol use. High-schoolers typically show the most stress in their emotional state. Ongoing irritability, difficulty in concentrating, breaking into crying fits over deadlines, perceived mistakes and failures, and loss of sense of humour are strong signals of high stress.

How Parents Can Help

The following tips are for parents to help their children cope with stress:

• Talk to your child about your expectations. It is important for both the child and the parent to make a solid commitment to working towards a good school year. Clearly define the expectations for the upcoming school year at the beginning so everyone is on board with what is expected.

• All children need help organizing their homework and study schedules. When you are out purchasing school supplies, pick up a notebook that can be used as a daily homework and assignment calendar. Every evening, review the assignment book and discuss what needs to be done. By helping your child schedule his or her homework and school projects, you are teaching a life skill that your child will rely on in the future. Organizing one's time is a critical step toward academic success.

• Emphasize personal relationships, not performance. Learn to succeed and enjoy yourself in the process. Having fun is important to mental and emotional stability.

• Spend quality time with your child. Let your child pick an activity you can do together. Keep the cellular phone at home or at the office.

• Compliment your child without comparing him or her to others. Show your child that his or her performance is what interests you.

• Listen but don't advise. There is a time to give advice and there is a time to just lend an ear.

• Keep your sense of humour. Show kids your ability to laugh at yourself and your situation. Children learn from their parents' example and a sense of humour can make a lot of problems disappear.

Neurosurgeon maintains his busy schedule at 63

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Charles Tator, one of only 160 neurosurgeons in Canada, still finds time in his 110-hour work week to canvass a few cards for the United Jewish Appeal.

Tator, 63, the only living neurosurgeon to hold the Order of Canada, performs 150 to 200 brain and spinal cord operations a year, (brain tumors and spinal defects are his two specialties).

Tator was former chair of neurosurgery at the University of Toronto for 10 years, where he is now a professor. He is one of the 11 surgeons at Toronto Western Hospital to which neurological patients from Mount Sinai Hospital are referred.

He works out of a small office at the Toronto Western Hospital, and often visits elementary and high schools in the area to preach the message of safety. Tator discusses issues such as the prevention of playground accidents – scarves getting caught in swings – and the prevention of sports-related head and neck injuries.

A slight decrease in this type of injury across Canada has been reported. But in hockey, the number of players of all ages suffering from broken necks is increasing, as a result of hard hits from behind, he said. "This situation is coming to a boil."

His interest in safety, and his research into the billions of nerve cells in the spinal system, are at the centre of his professional life.

The outlook for patients with neurosurgical problems (Parkinson's disease among them) has improved greatly in the last 15 years or so because of medical advances, said Tator.

It is a myth that Jewish people are more subject to strokes and other neurosurgical problems, he said.

An estimated two to three percent of the total population are affected, but this may not include the number of elderly people who have strokes but are not amenable to surgery.

"With the average life expectancy of women now at 78 and men at 74, it is not surprising that more strokes are occurring."

The shortage of neurosurgeons in Canada is a "significant problem," he said, caused to a great extent by the fact that they can cross the border to jobs where they work half as hard and earn four times as much.

Ways of tackling the problem, he said, include attracting more students to the specialty, and extending the careers of neurosurgeons who reach the retirement age of 65, though they could do fewer operations. Tator does not expect to retire at 65.

Rick McGinnis photo

Dr. Charles Tator

He is optimistic about the future of treating Parkinson's disease patients. "Hormones are being injected right into the brain, and the results of surgery are very good."

He is also excited about what is being accomplished by neurosurgeons in the University Health Network, which includes the Princess Margaret Hospital, the Toronto General Hospital and the Toronto Western Hospital.

In fact, he said, Toronto's neuroscience centre has the most, and the best, neurosurgeons in Canada.

Tator describes himself as "a total, Toronto product." Both sets of his grandparents lived near the Toronto Western Hospital, and his parents lived on Rusholme Road, when he was born at the Toronto General hospital. Later, they moved to Wembley Road in Forest Hill, and the York Mills area in North York.

His wife Carol, formerly of Detroit, is a race relations consultant who teaches in the anthropology department at York University. She is a former president of Temple Emanu-El, where both she and her husband are active members.

Married for 40 years, they have two sons and a daughter – Ira, a writer, Michael, in business, and Julie, a school teacher.

When he graduated from U of T medical school in 1961, Tator first thought of becoming a psychiatrist, but the physical mysteries of the brain appealed to him more than the theories of Sigmund Freud, he said.

"Psychiatry has changed so much, with the emphasis on biological and physical treatments. The two professions are becoming closer. I don't know if I would make the same decision today."

TORONTO — The Dental Volunteers for Israel will honour Dr. Barry Chapnick, Alpha Omega's 93rd international president, at its 16th annual Musical Soiree.

Chapnick is the fifth Canadian to serve as president of Alpha Omega – one of the world's largest dental organizations.

A 1970 graduate of the University of Toronto, Chapnick maintains a private endodontic practice and is a lecturer and associate in dentistry at the University of Toronto's faculty of dentistry. He is also an endodontic consultant at the Mount Sinai Hospital and Humber Memorial Hospital.

Chapnick served in all of the executive positions in the Toronto alumni chapter and served as president in 1986-87. He was president of the Canadian Academy of Endodontics in in 1990-91 and dental consultant to the World Basketball Championships in 1994.

Dr. Barry Chapnick

In 1989, he was cited for his contributions to the profession by the Ontario Dental Association with its Award of Merit. He also received fellowships in the International College of Dentists and honours at other international associations.

Chapnick has also served as a volunteer dentist for the Jewish Family and Child Service.

Dr. Stanley Jacobson, president of DVI Canada says, "Barry Chapnick has served the Toronto community as a whole and the dental community particularly with dedication and generosity."

He adds that Chapnick's interest in the DVI project in Jerusalem, "has made a difference in quality of life for many children."

DVI offers free dental and preventative care for Jerusalem's Israeli and Arab underprivileged children and for children of new immigrants.

Thousands of Jewish and non-Jewish dentists from 14 countries, work at the clinic for periods of one to four weeks.

They get free apartments for their families while they give of their time and expertise to serve as volunteer dentists at the clinic. In their spare time, the families participate in trips, lectures and receive free concert and other event tickets.

As well as his involvement with many professional organizations, Chapnick is a contributor to many other local Jewish organizations, including Jewish National Fund, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and State of Israel Bonds.

Chapnick, his wife Jane and children, Cary and Stephen are avid fans of the Blue Jays, Maple Leafs, Raptors and Argonauts. And when time permits, he enjoys theatre, photography and travel.

The Chapnicks are members of the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Other Canadian presidents of Alpha Omega have included John Sherman, Harry Jolley, Murray Cornish and Gordon Perlmutter.

This year's Alpha Omega soiree will take place on Sept. 17 at 7:30 p.m. and will feature pianist, Shaya Petroff, and violinist, Catherine Manoukian.

Guest violinist, Manoukian has appeared as a soloist with many Canadian and international orchestras. In 1994, she won first prize at the Canadian Music Competition. Manoukian was guest soloist at the ceremony honouring Seiji Ozawa's 25 years with the Boston Symphony.

NYGH set to open Community Care Centre at Branson Division

TORONTO — North York General Hospital (NYGH) will open the new Community Care Centre to treat urgent medical problems at the Branson Division on Sept. 11.

The Community Care Centre will replace the Branson Division emergency department as part of a hospital-wide reorganization of patient services.

The centre will be open seven days a week from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. The centre will look after the vast majority of patients who visit emergency departments with problems such as broken bones, sprains, cuts, asthma, coughs and bronchitis, ear aches, abdominal pains, allergic reactions and skin rashes.

"The Community Care Centre is more than a walk-in clinic because we will offer comprehensive urgent medical care to the residents of the Branson community.

"Our doctors and nurses are trained to handle any medical emergency. We will have full service medical imaging and laboratory departments at the Branson Division, so patients can have all their tests in one place at one time," chief of emergency services, Dr. Tim Rutledge says.

"If a patient has a more serious problem that requires admission to hospital, they will be transferred by ambulance to the General Division emergency department at Leslie and Sheppard.

"The expansion of the emergency department at the General Division is now finished and there is more space to look after more patients," he adds.

Rutledge believes the centre at Branson will help reduce the pressure on local emergency departments.

"I think there will be a real advantage for people to visit the Community Care Centre for their urgent medical needs. The staff will be able to assess and treat people faster because they won't be busy looking after critically ill patients."

Ambulances will not take patients to the Community Care Centre. They will be taken to the closest emergency department.

***

Last April, North York General Hospital announced plans to reorganize patient services at the Branson and General Divisions in order to improve quality and access to care for people living in north central Toronto.

"There is absolutely no reduction in service," President and CEO Murray MacKenzie says. "Only where some services are provided may change. I am convinced that our community will receive better and more timely care as a result of the changes we're making."

Other aspects of the reorganization include:

- Transferring medical, surgical and psychiatric inpatient services from Branson Division to the General Division;
- Creating two new units at the Branson Division: a short-term rehabilitation unit and a progressive care unit for patients waiting admission to long-term or chronic care facilities;
- Transferring some day surgery and outpatient services from the General Division to the Branson Division; and
- Increasing specialized geriatric services for seniors across the organization, particularly the Branson Division.

This reorganization of patient services is another step in achieving the Health Services Restructuring Commission (HSRC) directions to convert the Branson site into a world class ambulatory health care centre with a focus on services for seniors.

Walk/run to aid colon cancer research

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The annual Body 'N' Soul walk/run for colon cancer research has added a silent auction to its program this year.

The walk/run takes place Sept. 10, starting at Leslie Street and Sheppard Avenue. Co-chair Amy Lerman hopes it will raise $100,000.

Her goal is based on increasing participation, she said. Last year, the event raised $75,000; the first one three years ago, netted $23,000.

Lerman stressed the importance of research into the disease, noting that "if detected early enough, colon cancer can be cured."

The registration fee for the five-kilometre walk or the 10-kilometre run is $25 on site, or $50 for a family, beginning at 9:30 a.m. Refreshments will be available.

Bidding at the silent auction for clothing, sundries and special prize packages will take place around noon. There are also raffle prizes, including an all-expense paid trip to Biloxi, Miss.

Colorectal cancer is the third leading cause of cancer-related deaths in Canada, according to Dr. Zane Cohen and Dr. Steven Gallinger of Mt. Sinai Hospital. It occurs equally among men and women, regardless of age, race or general state of health.

There are about 16,600 new cases of colorectal cancer in Canada each year, and incidence of the disease is increasing steadily, according to Canadian Cancer Statistics, 1999.

The money raised by the walk/run goes to Mt. Sinai Hospital's gastrointestinal cancer research fund.

For information about the run and parking instructions, call 416-782-6387 or visit the Web site at www.walk4cancer.com.

Yom Kippur War film highlights festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Israeli movie revolving around the Yom Kippur War is among the films of Jewish interest to be presented at the 25th Toronto International Film Festival next month.

The festival, one of the world's largest, runs from Sept. 7 to 16.

In all, 329 films, including 178 world and North American premieres, will be screened.

Israel's sole entry at this year's festival, Kippur, is actually a French-Israeli co-production, and was shown at the Cannes International Film Festival in May.

The director, Amos Gitai, has made more than a dozen films, including Kadosh, which turned on the lives of haredim in Jerusalem.

Kippur, which tells the story of the 1973 war through the eyes of seven Israeli soldiers, is autobiographical.

During the war, Gitai, a student, joined an air force rescue unit. On a mission to bring back an Israeli pilot whose plane had been downed over Syrian territory, the helicopter was hit by anti-aircraft fire, killing the co-pilot and wounding the mechanic and Gitai.

Flying out of enemy range, the helicopter limped back to Israel, where Gitai began a difficult recovery at a hospital in Safed, a rehabilitation centre and at his girlfriend's house.

Born in Haifa in 1950, Gitai studied architecture in Israel and in California.

In 1975, he started shooting short films.

Gitai went to live in Paris after making a controversial film about the 1982 war in Lebanon, but returned to Israel seven years ago.

Since then, he has directed more than 10 films, notably A House in Jerusalem and Zion, Auto-Emancipation.

Retrospectives of his work have been held in a number of countries.

The British Film Institute published a book about Gitai in 1994.

Mystery book delves into Holocaust

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO—The recently published mystery, To Die in Spring, is much more than a mystery.

Written by Sylvia Maultash Warsh, a teacher of creative writing and a published author of poetry and magazine articles, the book is partly set in Toronto's famed Kensington Market.

With the Holocaust as a major theme, the book is based on some of her parents' experiences during World War II. "Their stories which go back to the Nazi death camps in Poland made a big impression on me. I wanted to show what is was like," Warsh said.

Another major theme in the book is mental illness or perceived illness. She says that her husband, psychiatrist Jerry Warsh, who works in bipolar research, was her medical consultant for the book.

Warsh said she intended to make the mystery novel "both entertaining and educational."

Sylvia Maultash Warsh

In To Die in Spring, the major character, Dr. Rebecca Temple, is a family physician in Toronto who practices psychotherapy. The story, set in 1979, takes place six months after the death of her husband.

Alone and starting over again, she is confronted with the violent murder of a patient, Goldie Kochinsky, a gentle, elderly lady who she earlier diagnosed as paranoid.

Struggling with the guilt she feels over the possible misdiagnosis, she turns detective and becomes the killer's next victim.

Warsh was born in Stuttgart, Germany and immigrated to Canada when she was four years old. She attended Downsview Collegiate and received a master's degree in Linguistics at the University of Toronto.

She has written three unpublished novels. Parts of some short stories and her poetry collection have been published in literary magazines and anthologies.

Warsh teaches creative writing to seniors for the Toronto District School Board and teaches seniors at the Bernard Betel Centre, as well as the Wagman Centre.

Warsh says that reading historical fiction "is different from history books which are abstract with names, dates, etc. In fiction, the reader identifies with the characters and if those characters suffer, the reader experiences the events on a deeper level."

Paintings explore surreal world

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Artist Beca Rind invites viewers of her paintings to interpret her surrealistic and colourful works.

Rind says her 24 acrylic on canvas paintings on exhibit at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre until Nov. 7., speaks with more than one voice.

"The images surge from the bitter core of life's experience or emerge from an essential longing for the lost serenity of an earlier age," she says. She told The CJN that each of her paintings has its own story and she hopes viewers will make an effort "to enter the feelings engraved in my paintings" and perhaps find new meaning in them.

Rind said her landscapes, urban scenes and other subjects "lie somewhere in a universe of mood and feelings, rather than in the real world."

The exhibition is sponsored by the Israeli Artists Group of Toronto.

Rind, born in Romania, studied at the Bucharest Academy of Fine Arts where she later was an associate professor of drawing and painting.

She was a member of the Romanian Painters' Association and participates in the association's annual exhibitions.

She has featured paintings in group and solo shows in Bucharest, Moscow, Paris, Prague, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

Her paintings hang in the Bucharest State Museum of Arts and in private collections throughout the world.

Rind settled in Israel in the 1960s where she continued to teach, paint and create book illustrations.

Her large painting entitled, Joseph and his Brothers, was mounted in Toronto in the lobby of the Elgin Theatre during the run of the musical, Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dream Coat.

In 1994, she moved to Toronto to join her son, grandchildren and sister.

Since her arrival in Canada, Beca Rind has participated in several Society of Canadian Artists shows.

Winnipeg's Finjan a leading light in Klezmer music

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

Since its rescue in the late-70's from near-extinction, klezmer music has grown into one of the most popular sub-genres of world music.

Thanks to the pioneering work of early revival bands, it is no longer necessary to refer to this musical phenomenon as a revival. Klezmer is no longer in need of resuscitation – the patient is healthy and hearty, well beyond convalescence.

While most of the early revival groups may no longer be at the cutting edge of klezmer creativity, they are continually heralded as pioneers in their field and given due deference as such.

But one group for whom this recognition has been elusive, despite their longevity and ongoing creative vitality, is Canada's own Finjan.

Touring in support of their first CD release in eight years, the group was in town last weekend for two concert performances at Habourfront Centre, where they demonstrated why they are still a leading light in klezmer music and ought to be accorded recognition for their early (and continuing) contributions to the music.

Canada's first klezmer revival band, Finjan was born 18 years ago. At that time, the klezmer world was populated by only a handful of practitioners. While artists like Klezmer Conservatory Band, Kapelye, Andy Statman, and the Klezmorim plied their trade in the media hotbeds of Boston, New York, and San Francisco, Finjan tooled in relative obscurity in the frosty Canadian outpost of Winnipeg. Once the revival caught on in the late-80s and early 90s, the aforementioned American groups received most of the credit for the resurgence of the form.

In 1992, Finjan released their seminal artistic recording, Crossing Selkirk Avenue, which should have garnered them the recognition they deserved. But while this brilliant effort received Juno-nominations and Canadian critical acclaim, it failed to attract much attention in the American or European klezmer world despite the genre's exploding popularity. Perhaps frustrated by their continuing lack of recognition, Finjan dropped off the klezmer radar for much of the last seven years.

They have recently returned with a new CD, Drawing on Water, released on the prestigious Rounder Records label. The new disc demonstrates not only the group's continued brilliance, but also the creative evolution they have undergone during their recording hiatus.

Much of the CD finds them experimenting with Romanian, Ukrainian, Balkan, electronic, and other non-klezmer influences.

The opening track Sharon's Dance (comprising two klezmer dance melodies composed and recorded by clarinet master Dave Tarras in the 40s and 50s) sets the tone for the disc, showcasing all the hallmarks of Finjan's distinctive sound: virtuosic playing, subtle reworking of traditional melodies, tight interplay involving all the instruments, and a distinct sense of humour underlying throughout.

Finjan

Clarinetist Myron Schultz stands out throughout the disc with his impeccable tone and fierce chops, although he gives way quite a bit, perhaps too much, to Sasha Boychuk's soprano sax and sopilka (Ukrainian wood flute). Boychuk is undeniably virtuosic but at times a touch garish, obscuring the soul of the music with his brash tone and dense phrasing.

In addition to the opening track, the CD features a number of standout performances, including Father's Nign, A Heimischer Sher, and Azoi Tanzi Men Odessa.

The highlight of the CD is undoubtedly violinist Victor Schultz's poignant rendering of Haneros Halelu, based on a haunting Jewish violin solo recorded by H. Steiner in Lvov in 1910. Schultz dedicates the piece to his late wife, and invests his prayerful performance with all the melancholy beauty and sadness so central to the soul of klezmer music.

Dancing On Water is for the most part an impressive return to the recording studio for Finjan, but occasionally the group sounds uninspired and the CD seems to lack the artistic coherence of their previous effort Crossing Selkirk Avenue.

While Finjan's new studio sound may still be evolving, there is no doubt that the group still knows how to put on a good concert. Their two performances last weekend at Harbourfront Centre's Rhythms of the World Festival were high-spirited, intensely entertaining experiences.

From the first notes of Odessa Bulgar, Finjan captivated the modest but enthusiastic crowd at the outdoor Molson stage. Mixing older material with selections from the new CD, the group had the audience dancing in their seats, if not in the aisles.

Highlights included Kinzey Posen's always robust and inventive bass-playing, accordionist Shayla Fink's elegant Yiddish vocals, and the group's performance of the Turkish-inflected Bosphouros Freylekh, in which banjoist Daniel Koulack summoned up the sounds of Istanbul with a unique "frailing" technique combining elements of Appalcahian and Middle-Eastern music.

Though forced to compete with the sounds of planes overhead and ships in the harbour, Finjan prevailed with their animated stage style and engaging set.

Even more impressive was the group's performance in a workshop later in the afternoon at the Lakeside Terrace. Co-hosting with New York Celtic group Whirlygig, Finjan made their counterparts look pale by comparison. Whirlygig's reels and jigs simply could not compete with Finjan's freylekhs and sirbas.

The workshop culminated with what has become Finjan's trademark live routine. After playing through a joyous Ukrainian-Jewish Wedding Dance, the group settled into an insistent vamp while saxophonist Boychuk and clarinetist Schultz ventured out into the audience to duel across the aisles.

With their improvised interplay, the two reed players delighted all, eliciting laughter and awe from the audience. Succeeding where others fail, Finjan is able to introduce lighthearted humour and whimsicality to their performances without ever playing the "kitsch-card" or appearing self-parodic.

Now in their chai year of existence and seemingly poised for greater exposure with their new record deal, we should be hearing much more about Finjan than we have the past few years.

Their new CD, an entertaining and interesting album that promises greater future works, should receive wider exposure than past efforts. Hopefully, the record-keepers of the klezmer world will take note and give them the recognition they deserve as one of the top contemporary groups, and as one of the earliest and most creative klezmer revival bands.

Celebrate Pic-O-De-Crop in Barbados

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

BARBADOS — You wouldn't think it would be hard to get a flight to Barbados mid summer. But it is, 'cause it's party time on this tropical Caribbean Island!

Over a five-week period, culminating the first week in August, the population of 260,000 joins visitors from around the world to celebrate Crop Over. The celebration is not as well known as neighbouring Trinidad and Tobago's Carnival – but equally as fun!

This colourful festival began in the 1780s. At the end of the sugar cane season, a massive party was held to celebrate the end of the harvest – thus the name, Crop Over.

By the 1940s, the Barbados sugar industry began to decline and so the Crop Over was abandoned. However, in 1974, with tourism growing by leaps and bounds, it was decided to revive the celebration.

Evan Millner oversees the restoration of the Jewish cemetery.

Over the last 26 years, the festival has become a successful showcase of Barbadian culture chock-full of vivid costumes, spectacular exhibitions, beautiful local crafts and music, music, music!

Crop Over begins with the Ceremonial Delivery of the Last Canes and a King and Queen of the Festival are anointed.

Other festival activities and events take place in the Bridgetown Market. The market, just outside the island's capital, is currently located right on the Spring Garden Highway, but is fastly outgrowing this location. Commuters will be thrilled when the market changes locations next year.

The Bridgetown Market boasts vendors' stalls and lively entertainment – it's hot, it's crowded and it's definitely not for the faint hearted.

A number of the most popular events are held at the National Stadium. The Pic-O-De-Crop is a concert dedicated to the island's calypsonians.

The calypso singers and the evening's master of ceremonies communicate in a very broad Bajan dialect and although it is not always understandable to foreign visitors, the pulsating rhythms transcend any verbal boundaries and the gist of the message is somewhat understood.

Pic-O-De-Crop is followed by the Fore-Day Morning Jump-Up where revellers hang out until the wee hours of the night.

If you aren't too pooped to party the next night, check out Cohobblopot. This event is filled with extravagant costumes and a variety of musical guests. This year, the Barbadian-born, Toronto-based band, The Troubadours, was featured.

Crop Over ends with the Grand Kadooment. Large "bands" of people adorn elaborate costumes depicting a variety of themes. The participants parade from the National Stadium to Spring Garden to the beat of calypso music. It can be viewed on the street or for a fee at the Stadium.

When Crop Over ends, most visitors take time to relax on the beach or partake in a relaxing massage at one of the many resorts including the Almond Beach Club & Spa on the island's West Coast.

Things to do in Barbados include riding the Atlantis Submarine, exploring Harrison's Cave or walking the Andromeda Botanic Gardens.

Barbados is 23 kilometres wide and 33 kilometres long. The island, rich in history, was discovered in 1536 by Portuguese explorer Pedro a Campos. Historical attractions include the Barbados Museum & Historical Society, Morgan Lewis Sugar Mill, Sunbury Plantation House and the Synagogue Nidhe Israel.

A view of the north coast of Barbados. [Kathryn Kates photos]

The first Jews on the island arrived from South America in 1628 and by 1681, the population grew to 280.

It is likely that the first synagogue in Bridgetown was in existence before 1679, however, it was destroyed by a hurricane in 1831.

A new synagogue was built and consecrated in March 1833. Although many of the original Jews assimilated, a small group of Ashkenazi Jewish refugees arrived shortly before WWII.

The cemetery at Nidhe Israel is under renovation.

The Jewish population today consists of only 25 families and no rabbi. The government of Barbados protects the synagogue as a landmark.

For the last two summers, Evan Millner of England, a Jewish studies scholar, who is a qualified architectural stonecarver specializing in historical replacement carving, has volunteered to oversee operations to restore the ancient cemetery of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews of Barbados.

If you are lucky enough to visit when Millner is on-site, he will enthusiastically show you the progress made.

To ensure flights and hotels during Crop Over it is best to book well in advance. For more information on Barbados and Crop Over go to www.barbados.org.

To learn more about the Nidhe Israel Synagogue visit Millner's Web site at www.aldgate.freeserve.co.uk.

Players hit fog-bound ice gearing up for hockey season

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It used to be that in the world of sports, the "boys of summer" referred to baseball players taking to the field on long hot summer nights. Nowadays however, it can just as easily mean hockey players heading for fog-bound ice rinks as they gear up for late summer hockey training camps.

For the Henrich brothers – Michael and Adam – and for Robert Gherson, thoughts of winter on ice begin sometime in August. The three young men have been busy getting in shape, pumping iron and working on hockey drills as they get ready for a season that begins before Labour Day.

Michael is the former Barrie Colt star who was drafted by the Edmonton Oilers two years ago in the first round of the junior entry draft. He'll be attending his third Oilers camp and believes he has a good chance of making the NHL club this time.

His brother, Adam, was also a first round pick – in his case, of the Brampton Battalion of the major junior Ontario Hockey League (OHL). Gherson, likewise, was drafted by an OHL team, the Sarnia Sting.

Gherson, who played last season with the Wellington Dukes of the Ontario Hockey Association (OHA), will be joining another Jewish junior, Eric Himelfarb, a veteran of the Sting.

For Gherson, who turns 17 in October, advancing to the OHL is a natural progression after registering a terrific season for the Dukes. Last year, Gherson honed his talents, developed his butterfly style, got into lots of games and impressed everyone who watched him.

In 30 games, the six-foot, 140-pound netminder recorded a 2.65 goals against average and shut out the opposition three times. He was selected to the Ontario Under-17 team and played one game in an international tournament in Sudbury.

Disappointed that he rode the bench for most of that tourney, Gherson dedicated himself to raising his game a notch.

"It was a good experience but I didn't like sitting on the bench," he said. "After that, I figured I had to work so much to be where I wanted to be. I worked harder during practice and I tried to focus more before games."

That meant "not screwing around, playing nintendo and getting my game face on," he said.

As the season wore on, U.S. colleges expressed an interest in recruiting him but Gherson, who'd been drafted by Sarnia as a bantam the year before, signed with the OHL squad in late June.

At season's end, his work in the Dukes' cage was recognized by the league as he was named an Eastern Division all-star.

Terry Doran, Sarnia's incoming manager, said "we expect him to evolve into our goaltender" of the future.

Although Andrew Sim, a rookie with the Sting last season, has the inside track on the being the first string goalie, "hopefully Robert can push Andrew...The job's there for taking," Doran said. "He has to learn the league and get his confidence."

"People say he was very good in the Tier II League (OHA). We expect he'll have no trouble stepping up and playing at this level," said Doran.

Adam Henrich, 16, was a highly regarded prospect prior to being drafted earlier this summer. He received a AA rating from OHL Central Scouting – its highest ranking – prior to the draft. He was chosen by Brampton in the first round, seventh overall. Last season he played with the Don Mills Midget Flyers event though he was of bantam age.

Henrich, a six-foot-three-and-a-half inch, 200-pound left winger, is built like the prototypical power forward. He likes contact but he's also a solid puck carrier, good playmaker and he has a wicked shot. His skating improved tremendously last year but he says he still has to work on developing a quicker start.

He's excited about joining the Battalion, an up-and-coming team that's coached by Stan Butler, who's slated to coach the Canadian juniors at the world championships this year.

"He told me that I'll have to work my way into the lineup and make the team. I'll have to earn my spot on the team," Henrich said.

Last season, Henrich scored 31 goals and added 52 assists in 49 games with Don Mills.

His big brother Michael is a big inspiration for Adam. "He's always saying, 'let's go, let's go' and telling me to work hard every shift," Adam said.

The two brothers have been working out together for much of the summer, along with Himelfarb, a good buddy and a family friend.

Despite their friendship and that of their families, Himelfarb can't expect any favours when he's on the ice facing Henrich. "You've got to take it seriously," Henrich said. "If he has the puck in the corner, I'm going to go after him."

Michael, meanwhile, is looking forward to camp with the Oilers. "I want to see if I've improved since last training camp. Hopefully, I'll get a shot."

"I think my overall game has improved," said Michael, six-foot-three, 208 pounds. "I'm a more well-rounded player, stronger. I'm going to go in and finish my hits. I'm not going to back down from anything."

* * *

There's a third top athlete in the Henrich household, 13-year-old sister Laura.

A ringette and soccer player on Thornhill rep teams, she was named Athlete of the Year at Yorkhill Public School. Her other sports include volleyball, basketball, track and field, cross-country running and she helps out coaching youngsters in gymnastics.

Booze, drugs...and denial

They're out there, much as some people deny it or wish otherwise.

In fact, they could number up to 20,000 in the Greater Toronto Area, with many more collateral victims.

And it's only now that the Jewish community is getting serious about helping them.

As far as Neville Smith is concerned, it's time Jews realized it: there is such a thing as Jewish alcoholics and drug addicts. And families are being torn apart.

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Smith, a 57-year-old businessman, knows he's got his work cut out. As the new volunteer chair of the local chapter of JACS (Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others), he's on a mission to educate Jews about substance abuse – fighting the pernicious and prevalent denial of the problem – as well as placing as many Jewish addicts as possible on the road to recovery.

JACS was unveiled here last March, when Jewish Family & Child Service agreed to fund a local mutual-help group for substance abusers as a two-year pilot project. The group is now officially off the ground.

JACS has a mission statement (partly "to pursue recovery in a nurturing Jewish environment"), a telephone hotline (416-410-JACS) and a six-person volunteer executive – three men and three women, ranging in age from their late 30s to mid-50s – all from alcoholic or co-dependent backgrounds. It is planning meetings, retreats and an extensive public awareness program, including a Web site, to shine a light on a cunning and baffling disease.

Smith, raised by a violent alcoholic father and co-dependent mother, says he's encountering a "tremendous" amount of denial in the community, as well as a huge shame factor among addicts. "Their biggest fear," Smith says, "is that someone will find out." Smith himself used to drive miles away to attend meetings so no one would recognize him.

JACS promises complete anonymity.

Another stumbling block over the years has been the fact that meetings of groups such as Alcoholics Anonymous and Narc-Anon have almost always taken place in church basements – uncomfortable for many Jews.

Eventually, JACS will be meeting in the Bathurst-Sheppard area, at a neutral venue to be donated by a private benefactor. The storefront location, to be dubbed JACS Place, will cater to every Jewish denomination, and will be fully kosher. It hopes one day to host seders (wine-free, of course).

JACS was started in 1979 in New York, and to date, has helped some 6,000 people to date. It runs kosher retreats, and educates the Jewish public as much as it aids Jews in recovery, using the traditional 12-step program, tailored to reflect Jewish values.

To help explode the myth that Jews don't drink or do drugs, JACS in Toronto will rely on a 1992 New York study that found the incidence of alcoholism and drug abuse was the same among Jews as in society in general – between 10 and 12 percent.

In Toronto, the extrapolation is staggering: it could mean that with a Jewish population of 175,000, there are up to 20,000 addicted Jews and three times that many people directly affected – family, loved ones, friends and business associates.

Smith now needs volunteers to go out and speak in synagogues, day schools, even yeshivot. Others are required to help with Web site design and desktop publishing.

The community is invited to an open house Oct. 25, at a location to be announced, to learn more about alcoholism and drug abuse. A retreat to New York state is planned for November.

"We must hear the message that help and hope are available," says Smith. "We're going to demonstrate to the community that we have lots to offer, and that we're here to stay."

About Seniors

By DR. MARK CLARFIELD

Don't medical students go into medicine to succour the ill, comfort the dying, calm the anxious, heal the diseased and receive thanks and sometimes money in return? Or at least we thought so until the third year of medical school, after which a kind of atherosclerosis of the emotional circulatory system can set in.

Dr. Mark says...

From the dawn of time until the first third of this century, care was given to the ill, at first in a cave and then in the home, mostly by family, and in dire circumstances, by the doctor.

With the rise of scientific medicine and the hospital, doctors and patients began to prefer to take illness out of the home and to institutionalize it. After World War II, with almost everyone having access to a car, it became easy for patients to be transported to their preferred temple of health.

As a result, unfortunately, the incidence of home visiting has decreased significantly. Yet, if one puts one's stethoscope to the ground, a faint rumble can be heard. Physicians are returning to the time-honoured practice of home visiting, especially in the care of the elderly. But why? Certainly not for the money.

First, for the proper, full assessment of an elderly person, nothing works so well as a house call. Simply by entering the patient's home, one can instantly get a sense of how well she is coping. Want to know about nutrition? Ask about the food she has eaten that day. What about drugs? Ask the patient to gather up all her medications and plunk them onto the kitchen table. Ask if medicines are kept anywhere else in the house. Keep your eyes open for obvious signs that there may be difficulties.

There are, however, some valid reasons why a physician might be discouraged from doing home visits. First, it is a time-consuming process. And since time is money, home visiting is almost always, in the strict sense of the word, a losing proposition.

Despite this problem, the profession and government must realize that the utility of home visiting should be rethought. If house calls to the elderly are to increase, resources will have to be devoted to them. With the increasing number of elderly Canadians, can we really afford not to carry out more of this time-honoured and tested manoeuvre?

Mark Clarfield is the chief of academic affairs at the Sarah Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem and a staff geriatrician of the Division of Geriatric Medicine, Sir Mortimer B. Davis – Jewish General Hospital, McGill University, Montreal.

A Strategic Initiative For Our Children

UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 – The Campaign For Our Children – is a dramatic community initiative to keep up with the challenges created by our spectacular growth. It is our opportunity to answer the urgent needs of young people in a city that includes two-thirds of all Canadian Jewish youth.

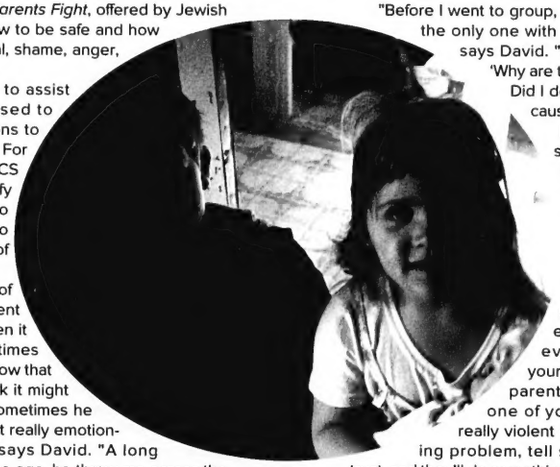
The Campaign For Our Children intends to raise $45 million – $4 million more than last year. The additional funds will be directed toward assisting local young people in distress; welcoming young newcomers to our community; nurturing young Jewish souls; and furthering the rescue of Jews from troubled regions such as the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia.

These stories illustrate some of the ways in which your gift answers the needs of those who cannot always ask for themselves.

The Gift of Hope: Breaking the Abuse Cycle

When David* celebrates his Bar Mitzvah later this year, he will be more of a man than many of his peers could imagine. David, you see, has had to grow up quickly – dealing with the emotions and confusion of being exposed to abuse in his own home.

But David does not have to go through his pain alone. As a participant in an 8-week counseling group, When My Parents Fight, offered by Jewish Family & Child Service, David learned how to be safe and how to deal with his feelings – including denial, shame, anger, guilt and isolation.



UJA FEDERATION provides funding to assist children and women exposed to abuse. Increased contributions to UJA FEDERATION's Campaign For Our Children will provide JF&CS with the resources to identify and help more children who have witnessed abuse, and to run more groups for children of different ages.

"I know there were a lot of fights – my parents usually sent us down to the basement when it happened – and Mom sometimes said that Dad hit her. I don't know that for sure, but sometimes I think it might be true. Sometimes he can get really emotional," says David. "A long time ago, he threw me across the room, but I don't remember that. I don't really believe it."

This kind of denial is common, especially among children, as they are reticent to disclose any part of their "secret" to adults, says Janice Shaw, the social worker who heads up this JF&CS counseling program. "But they do speak more freely with the other kids, which is why the group is so beneficial to them," she says.

Aside from getting children to open up and discuss their feelings, the sessions also let kids know they aren't alone in their experiences.

"Before I went to group, I thought I was the only one with this problem," says David. "And I thought, 'Why are they doing this? Did I do something to cause this?'"

Now, he understands that he's not alone, and that he's not to blame. He even offers words of wisdom to other children who share his experience: "Don't ever think it's your fault. Let your parents resolve it. If one of your parents is really violent or has a drinking problem, tell someone you trust, and they'll do something about it."

Above all, the program is critical because it maintains a level of hope for children who often get lost in the equation, says Shaw. "When it all seems impossible, we let them know that it can be different – that there is hope."

Not his real name.*

Life After Birthright Israel

For the 600 young adults from Toronto who are back home after participating in Birthright Israel – the journey is really just beginning.

The unprecedented pioneering initiative, which brought thousands of North American young people to Israel, is a springboard for greater involvement in Jewish life, starting with comprehensive post-trip programming coordinated by UJA FEDERATION. Additional funds raised by UJA FEDERATION's Campaign 2001 – The Campaign For Our Children – will help to ensure the continuation of programs that follow Birthright Israel trips.

"The trip gave us inspiration to become involved," says participant Judith Zwaigenbaum, 26. "Many people who went are calling their leaders to stay connected with the community." Zwaigenbaum has lent her time through speaking engagements about how the trip changed her life.

Brad Byrne

Birthright Israel was also the impetus for Thornhill's Brad Byrne, 21, to give back to the community. Since joining the February trip, he has entered the speaking circuit, raised funds for UJA FEDERATION's Israel Funwalk 2000, and even returned to Israel as a counselor at the Kefiada camp at Kfar Giladi.

"Birthright Israel was one of the most rewarding, gratifying and satisfying experiences of my life," says Byrne, who now wants to learn Hebrew. "It helped me understand what it means to be Jewish and how much we've sacrificed to be where we are today."

Zwaigenbaum agrees. "When I could see the view of Jerusalem from the plane, it hit me – I had a sense of ownership suddenly – that this is my land," she says.

Kids on the Line

Life for residents in northern Israel – particularly the children – has been unsettled following the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon. But thousands of Confrontation Line kids were able to forget their fears about missiles and bombings for a while and have some summer fun, thanks to UIA Federations Canada and the Jewish Agency, partners of UJA FEDERATION.

Initiatives included trips to Rishon Lezion's "Superland," an amusement park more than three hours away from the border, and summer camps for children in northern communities, with North American counselors, through the Kefiada program.

Approximately 30,000 Confrontation Line children experienced a day of fun at Canada Centre, a sports and recreation facility in Metulla, Israel's northernmost town bordering Lebanon, built with Canadian donations.

"Life at the border has changed forever and we need to do what we can to give the children a feeling of normality," says Yossi Goldberg, the Chairman of Canada Centre. "The kids who come to Canada Centre feel like they are on holiday at Miami Beach, or in Toronto," says Goldberg. "It gives them an opportunity to have fun and feel that they are not alone."

Increased contributions from The Campaign For Our Children will help Israeli kids cope with the pressures of life along the northern border.

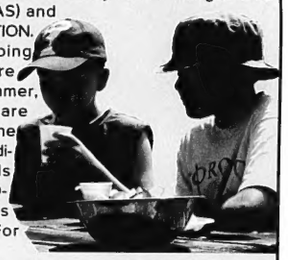
A Place To Belong

Thirteen Jewish newcomers, aged 12 and 13, spent five days camping at Albion Hills Conservation Area near Bolton, thanks to a new program coordinated by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) and UJA FEDERATION. Three camping sessions were held this summer, and more are planned for the future with additional funds from UJA FEDERATION's Campaign For Our Children.



The children, who pitched tents, prepared meals, played games and participated in Jewish-themed discussions and activities, felt a sense of belonging in the group. They all shared a similar background of emigrating from the former Soviet Union, eventually finding their way to Toronto. "It's good to be here because where I live there aren't a lot of Jews," said one camper.

Activities included an Israel Day, improvisational and movement games lead by Shula Saltzman from UJA FEDERATION's Board of Jewish Education and a Kabalat Shabbat program.

"It isn't easy for these kids," says youth worker Jenya Zuckerstein, who herself moved from the FSU and now calls Toronto home. "We want to help the children with language skills and this is a great setting to do that."
